Mrs. S., Bozeman, Mont.—We think that the name "Consols" was first used as a name for a governmental security of Great Britain, since which time certain other companies or corporations have named or applied the name "Consols" to some of their bonds or securities. As to just what the Consols you mention are, we are unable to state from the information you supply. In a general way, we presume that it is some form of a bond or security issued by some corporation. We think if you desire information in regard to this, you should take your securities to some reliable bond dealer who after examining the same, could probably give you some information as to the same.

W. P. S., Fargo, N. Dak.—We think that in order to legally change your name, it would be necessary to ether make an application to the proper court upon the proper petition or through a special act of legislation introduced to the legislature through some member thereof. We think that the usual method is a petition through the proper court. We think it would be advisable for you to employ some local lawyer to prepare this petition for you.

H. W., New Brunswick, N. J.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that in the absence of a will, the personal property of a decedent, after payment of debts and expenses, would go to the surviving husband or wife, providing one survives, and provided decedent leaves no issue or descendants.

The Masked Bridal

"Do you imagine her purpose was to get possession of that document?" questioned madam.

"I had thought of that—I have felt almost sure of it since you told me it had disappeared."

"But how could she have known that such a paper was in our possession? You did not receive it until long after——"

"Yes, I know," interposed Mr. Goddard, with a shiver; "nevertheless I am impressed that it is now in her possession, even though I did not suppose that any one, save you and I and Will Forsyth, ever knew of its existence."

There ensued an interval of silence, during which both appeared to be absorbed in deep thought.

"If she has it, what will she do with it?" madam suddenly questioned, lifting her heavy eyes to her companion.

"I am sure I cannot tell, Anna," he coldly returned.

"Well, then, what will you do, Gerald Goddard, in view of the fact, as you believe, that she is alive and has learned the truth?" she imperiously demanded.

"I—I do not think it will be wise for us to discuss that point just at present," he faltered.

"Coward! Is that your answer to me after twenty years of adoration and devotion?" cried the woman.

"After twenty years of jealousy, bickering, and turmoil, you should have said, Anna," was the bitter response.

"Beware! beware, Gerald! I have hot blood in my veins, as you very well know," was the menacing retort.

"I have long had a proof of that," he returned.

"Oh!" she cried, putting up her hand as if to ward off a blow, "you are cruel to me." Then, with sudden passion, she added: "Perhaps, after all, that document is in your possession—or at least that you know something about it."

"I only wish your surmise were correct, Anna; for, in that case, I should have no cause to fear her," said Mr. Goddard, gravely.

"Ha! Ev n you do 'fear' her?" cried madam, eagerly. "In what way?"

"Can you not see? If she has gained possession of the paper, she has it in her power to do both of us irreparable harm," the gentleman explained.

"Y s, yes," she moaned, "she could make society ring with our names—she could ruin us, socially; but I could better bear that than that she should assert a claim upon you—that she should use her power to—to separate us. She shall not, Gerald!" she went on, passionately; "there are other countries where you and I can go and be happy, utterly indifferent to what she may do here."

The man made no reply to these words—he was apparently absorbed in his own thoughts.

"Gerald! have you nothing to say to me?"

"What can I say, Anna? There is nothing that either of us can do but await further developments," the man returned, but careful to keep to himself the fact that he had an appointment with the woman whom she so feared.

"Would you dare be false to me, after all these years?"

"Pshaw, Anna! what a senseless question," he replied.

"But you admire—you think her very beautiful?"

"Why, that is a self-evident fact—every one must admit that she is a fine looking woman," was the evasive response.

"You will be very careful what you do, Gerald," she hissed. "I have never had over much confidence in you, in spite of my love for you; but there is one thing that I will not bear, at this late day, and that is, that you should turn traitor to me; so be warned in time."

She did not wait to see what effect her words would have upon him, but, turning abruptly, swept from the room, leaving him to his own reflections.

18-Inch Linen Centerpiece

Premium No. 7782.

Given For Two Subscriptions

THIS is another one of the fortunate purchases we made before the price of imported linen reached its present high figure to say nothing of the difficulty in getting it now at any price, as the supply in this country is getting low and absolutely none is being imported. This unusually attractive design is stamped on white Irish linen and is to be worked in solid and eyelet embroidery with buttonholed edge. While the design is a little more elaborate than some of the other centerpieces which we offer yet it is well worth all the time and labor you put in to it on account of the fine material and it is something that will retain its handsome appearance and give years of service. We will send you this 18-inch white linen centerpiece free upon the terms of the following

Club Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or one three-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents we will send you this pure linen centerpiece free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7782.

Comfort's League of Cousins

high. I have black hair and brown eyes. I weigh one hundred and thirty-four pounds. I live on a thirty-two-acre farm. The farm is owned by father. We live in a five-room house.

I have one brother and one half sister. When some boys get to be old as I am, they quit school, because they think they are too large. I have never got to where I was too large to go to school, and so I am still going, I study mental arithmetic, Greek, history, rhetoric, Latin and dictionary. My teacher's name is Miss Nellie Long. I want to go to college, but I am not able. Uncle Charlie do you know of a school that I could work my way through? I think every boy and girl should have a good education. One never gets too old to learn. We live to learn. Boys don't become ashamed or discouraged. Don't quit going to school just because you are behind with your work and because you are in classes with children smaller than you are.

I think that people who have children and won't send them to school ought to be forced to do so. If the parents are too poor to send their children to school the school board ought to buy them books and clothes. They pretend to force the children to go to school here but pretend is about all they do.

We had a very dry summer and fall here, which dried up lots of wells and caused the crops to be short. This county (Marshall) is very level here. We have cedar, walnut, oak, ash, and a good many other hard wood trees. This is a very healthy place.

Won't some of you cousins of about my age write to me? I will answer all I can.

Your nephew, PORTER NICKENS.

I don't see any reason Porter why you should not continue to go to school, even if you are nineteen. Just as you say we are never too old to learn, though most people are too old to unlearn, and as a rule before you can learn one new, worth-while thing, you have to unlearn a lot of bad old things, tradition and ignorance have for centuries been storing up in the darkened brains of our ancestors and which have been transmitted to us. It is easier to start with the youthful brain that is plastic and sow it with the seeds of real, worth-while knowledge, than to try and operate on a brain that has become age hardened with prejudice and stupidity into a sort of adamant growth of cranial granite which cannot be tilled or fertilized. There are plenty of colleges and universities in your state. Here are the names of a few of them, and you can write to the president of the one nearest you: University of Nashville; Washington and Tusculum College at Greenville; Maryville College at Maryville; Cumberland University at Lebanon; Burritt College at Spencer; Hiwasee College at Sweetwater; Bethel College at McKenzie; Carson and Newman College at Jefferson City; Walden University at Nashville; University of Chattanooga at Chattanooga; University of the South at Sewanee; King College at Bristol; Knoxville College at Knoxville; Milligan College at Milligan; Southwestern Presbyterian College at Clarksville; and Lincoln Memorial University at Cumberland Gap. Porter, as to going to school, nobody can be too old, but a person might easily be too large. I went to a school once and everything went along nicely until a remarkable family of fat humans moved into the village. There were eight children in that bunch and they were all of school age. The family name was More. One morning when we went to school we found four members of the More family installed inside the schoolroom. We never knew how they got in, but we had to take the roof off to get them out. When the teacher arrived she threw up her hands. However she was a woman of ideas and quite resourceful, so she had us all sit down on the ground outside the school, stood in the doorway, and by poking her head inside and outside the door managed to get the lessons over in pretty good shape. Just as the session was over, one of the More family handed the teacher a note. The note was from the mother of the Mores, and informed the teacher that this was only half of the family and that the other half would be on hand the next day. Things began to look serious, so teacher wrote Mrs. More a letter worded as follows: "Dear Mrs. More: Please don't send any more Mores to school, as we have more Mores now than we can handle, and we can't take any more Mores until we have more room." This is a small world and only built for ordinary, average people. People who are built on gigantic lines should go to school in a circus tent, or be measured for schools and carry them around with them. I'll wager there was some fun when Bill Taft first tried to go to school. I wonder who paid the bill for having the door enlarged. Porter, you say they only make a pretense of sending children to school in your part. I was looking at a picture of a beautifully constructed school in a middle west state the other day. That school would easily have accommodated three hundred children, but those who were actually attending school were only a beggarly handful. They were photographed standing on the steps of the building, and there were nearly as many teachers as scholars. Children who should have been in school, scores of them, were working in the fields. There are hundreds of other schools which could tell the same deplorable story, all the result of putting pretense before performance. It is a pity that our democracy and our ferocious individualism should make us such a bunch of law breakers. By keeping children out of school we rob them of education, do them a rank injustice, make them ignorant, and when you make people ignorant you make them lawless. Then by the law of compensation you get it back later on, for it is these children who have been wronged who wreak their vengeance on society in later years and give us a murder bill of nearly a thousand human lives a month, and a crime bill of hundreds of millions. Keep the children in school, knowledge is the only good, ignorance the only evil.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a one-year subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York, grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for March

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Uncle Charlie

"Says Uncle Charlie's Poems are Simply Grand!"

That's what Nelson Hill, Maple Ave., Danbury, Conn. says, and that is what they all say, and it takes a lot to amuse the people who live in the cities. Uncle Charlie's poems is a gorgeous, lilac silk bound, 160-page volume of rhymed, riotous delight. It makes you forget your troubles, and is the best cure for the blues in the world. For young and old it is the ideal birthday present. Why not hustle around among your neighbors and get up a club of only four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at twenty-five cents each and capture a copy of Uncle Charlie's poems and make yourself and the rest of the household happy for the rest of the year? This superb volume contains an absorbingly interesting sketch of Uncle Charlie's life and some splendid new pictures of himself and his family.

Uncle Charlie's Song Book Contains Some of the Prettiest Songs Ever Written

You will find twenty-eight of the dandiest, classiest songs, every song a hit and worth fifty cents apiece, songs for all occasions, church, parlor and platform in this superb volume of mirth, melody and sentiment. Five dollars' worth of music free for a club of only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at twenty-five cents each. Superb pictures of Uncle Charlie decorate the artistic cover. Both books free for a club of six. No home complete without them. Work for them today.

TINIEST DONKEY.—Hugh G. Tyrwhittdrake of Cobtree Manor, England, who recently arrived on the steamer Minnehaha, brought with him a collection of weird animals and birds to show to Dr. W. T. Hornaday, director of the Bronx Zoological Park, New York City, with a view to their acquisition by that institution. In the collection were a lioness, a reed buck, many birds of prey, two greater birds of paradise and the smallest donkey on earth, five years old and measuring 29 inches high at the shoulder.

RAISING REINDEERS.—Reindeer raising for American markets promises to become an important industry of Alaska. Herds of these animals are being cared for and managed just as cattle are handled in the United States. Already some have been slaughtered to be sent in cold storage to San Francisco and Seattle. It is predicted that fresh deer meat from Alaska will soon be found in the markets of all American cities, just as fresh salmon and halibut from Alaskan waters are sold today.

7 Wheel Chairs in February

395 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

Seven wheel chairs for February is not bad; it is one better than in January, and we ought to do still better in March so to get as many poor crippled shut-ins as possible out into the April sunshine and spring air.

The seven February chairs go to the following applicants. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

John B. Mitchell, Winnsboro, R. 6, Texas, 179; Roland E. Chewning, Boons Mill, R. 3, Box 104, Va., 169; Allen Doss, Diana, Tenn., 148; Miss Ann Allen, Gainsville, R. 2, Ga., 101; Walter Campbell, Dyersville, R. 2, Tenn., 101; Dorothy Kate Harris, Cumming, R.2, Ga., 100; Nada Pearl Strong, Oregon City, R. 3, Oregon, 99.

John B. Mitchell, age 69, suffers terribly from rheumatism which has drawn his legs up into a sitting position and crippled his arms so that he is unable to help himself in any way. His wife is dead and he makes his home with one of his children.

Roland E.Chewning, age 14, is afflicted with tuberculosis of the bone which has necessitated a surgical operation for removal of diseased bone from his leg, Roland's mother has been very desirous of obtaining this chair for her invalid boy as a help to her in caring for him as well as for his comfort.

Allen Doss, age 11, has one hip and one shoulder dislocated and useless as the effect of infantile paralysis which attacked him nine years ago. He wrote me a good, manly letter describing his condition and needs, and said he intended to get subscriptions to earn a COMFORT wheel chair.

Miss Allen, age 67, suffers severely from rheumatism in the joints which has crippled her to such an extent that she has to be helped about the house and has not been out of doors for four years. She is dependent on her sister who has only her little home. She expects her wheel chair to be a great benefit to her.

Little Dorothy Kate Harris, age eight, has been a cripple all her life and never able to walk. She has no use of her lower limbs. This wheel chair will enable her mother to take her out in the sun and air. Her father is an industrious worker but his income is small.

Nada Pearl Strong, age nine. Her mother's letter describes the little girl's condition thus: "She had infantile paralysis when three months of age. It would be impossible to tell all she has suffered and undergone. We had her treated three years ago by a Chiropractic doctor who helped her to some extent. She can use her right hand fairly well and her left a very little. She can move her lower limbs but cannot control them well enough to walk. She is bright and is interested in all things that interest children of her age, and she can read. With the baths and food prescribed by the doctor she keeps in fairly good health only that she is so helpless." The doctor's bills have been a heavy strain on their slender resources and the girl's parents appreciate the privilege of obtaining the wheel chair through COMFORT subscriptions.

All you good people (read their names in our Roll of Honor) who have helped these worthy sufferers to their much needed wheel chair must have a profound sense of happiness in learning of the blessings you have conferred by so doing. Many other equally needy and worthy shut-ins are bravely struggling to earn COMFORT wheel chairs, and I appeal to all our readers to help them. Your names will look well in our April Roll of Honor. Every little helps—send at least one subscription for them this month, if you can do no better.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

COMFORT Wheel Chair Will Be Lots of Pleasure to the Boy

SUMMERFIELD, N. C.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

We received Herbert's wheel chair today in fine shape and are well pleased with it. I wish to thank you and all the kind friends who helped me get it for him. It will be a lot of pleasure to him for he likes to be out of doors.

Yours respectfully, MRS. S. W. WALKER.

Likes Her COMFORT Wheel Chair

JAMESTOWN, N. DAK.

DEAR COMFORT:

I received my wheel chair December 20th and I think it is nice. I will have my picture taken in it next spring and will send you one. With many thanks I remain, Your friend, DELLA WYMAN.

COMFORT Wheel Chair a Great Blessing to Her

CURTOIS, MO.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

Mrs. Gillem received her wheel chair in good condition and wishes me to express her thanks to you and all who helped her get it. May the Lord bless you all. She is looking forward to springtime when she can enjoy many outings in her chair. It is a great comfort and blessing to her. May God bless Uncle Charlie in his great work.

Sincerely yours, MRS. THOS. M. BLOUNT.

Requests

Mrs. Will Reynolds, Chambersberg, Ill. wishes religious stories and poetry to read to small children.

Eliza V. Clauson, Bingham, 5th So. West St., Utah, would like to get the September, October, November and December numbers of "The Ladies' Home Companion" for 1908 and June, 1909.

Poem, "The Old Settler's Story," Send to Mrs. J. R. Hodgson, Kawal, Colo.

Poem, by Alice or Phœbe Cary,—"November," and another poem, "The House I Live In." Do not know the author.

Remedies

EARACHE.—For earache or rising in the ear, squeeze roasted onion juice in the ear, as hot as can be borne; then put a hot salt poultice against the ear.

A mustard poultice put on the pit of the stomach will relieve nausea.

MISS LITTLE, Mallory, S. C.

Poems Requested

The following poems have been requested by readers of COMFORT and sent for publication.

Bringing Our Sheaves

The time for toil is past and night has come,
The last and saddest of the harvest eves;
Worn out with labor long and wearisome,
Drooping and faint, the reapers hasten home,
Each ladened with his sheaves.

Last of the laborers, Thy feet I gain,
Lord of the harvest! and my spirit grieves
That I am burdened not so much with grain
As with a heaviness of heart and brain;
Master! behold my sheaves!

Full well I know I have more tares than wheat,
Brambles and flowers, dry stalks and withered leaves;
Therefore I blush and weep, as at thy feet
I kneel down reverently and repeat,
"Master, behold my sheaves!"

Few, light and worthless; yet their trifling weight
Through all my frame a weary aching leaves;
For long I struggled with my hapless fate,
And stayed and toiled till it was dark and late,
But these are all my sheaves.

And yet I gather strength and hope anew,
For well I know thy patient love perceives
Not what I did, but what I strove to do;
And though the full, ripe ears be sadly few
Thou wilt accept my sheaves.

No Playmates Any More

The glow is fading from the western sky,
And one by one my comrades, as of yore,
Have given up their play and said good by;
There isn't any one for me to play with any more.

Don't cry, dear heart! for I am worn and old;
No longer have I largess in my store;
E'en love's best gifts to me I could not hold,
There isn't any one for me to play with any more.

I miss the tender hand-clasps of old friends;
The kisses of the loved ones gone before;
'Tis lonely when the heart first comprehends
There isn't any one for me to play with any more.

I need these loving hearts, so fond and leal;
I want them in my arms, as heretofore;
When they are reached—I shall no longer feel
There isn't any one for me to play with any more.

—Last Stanzas Written by Mark Twain.

If

If you can keep your head when all about you
Are losing theirs and blaming it on you;
If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you,
But make allowances for their doubting too;
If you can wait and not be tired by waiting,
Of being lied about don't deal in lies,
Or being hated don't give way to hating,
And yet don't look too good, nor talk too wise:

If you can dream—and not make dreams your master;
If you can think—and not make thoughts your aim.
If you can meet with triumph and disaster
And treat those two impostors just the same,
If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken
Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools,
Or watch the things you gave your life to, broken,
And stoop and build 'em up with worn-out tools:

If you can make one heap of all your winnings
And risk it on one turn of pitch-and-toss,
And lose, and start again at your beginnings
And never breathe a word about your loss:
If you can force your heart and nerve and sinew
To serve your turn long after they are gone,
And so hold on when there is nothing in you
Except the will which says to them: "Hold on!"

If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue,
Or walk with Kings—nor lose the common touch,
If neither foes nor loving friends can hurt you,
If all men count with you, but none too much:
If you can fill the unforgiving minute
With sixty seconds' worth of distance run,
Yours is the earth and everything that's in it,
And—which is more—you'll be a Man, my son!

—Rudyard Kipling.

Crossing the Bar

Sunset and evening star,
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no moaning of the bar,
When I put out to sea.

But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
Too full for sound and foam,
When that which drew from out the boundless deep
Turns again home.

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark!
And may there be no sadness of farewell,
When I embark.

For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crossed the bar.

—Tennyson.

Ma's Tools

At home it seems to be the rule,
Pa never has the proper tool
Or knack to fix things; but the stunt
That stumps Ma though, you have to hunt.

The caster in the table leg
Fell out; Pa said a wooden peg
Would fix it up; but Ma kept mum
And fixed it with a wad of gum.

We could scarce open our front door
It stuck so tight, and Pa he swore
He'd buy a plane, as big as life,
Ma fixed it with the carving knife.

The bureau drawer got stuck one day,
And push or pull, 'twas there to stay;
Said Pa, "Some day 'twill shrink, I hope!"
Ma fixed it with a piece of soap.

The window shade got out of whack,
'Twould not pull down, or yet roll back;
Pa said, "No one can fix that thing!"
Ma fixed it with a piece of string.

The bathtub drain got all clogged up,
Pa baled the tub out with a cup;
He had a dreadful helpless look.
Ma cleared it with a crochet hook.

I broke the stove hinge one day,
'Twas cracked before, though, any way;
Pa said we'd put a new door in;
Ma grabbed her hair and got a pin.

So when my things get out of fix,
Do I ask Pa to mend them? "Nix!"
Ma just grabs what's near at hand,
And togs things up to beat the band.

12 Everblooming Rose Bushes

A Magnificent Collection Of The Newest Varieties In The Most Beautiful Colors

Given To You For A Club Of Two!

BEAUTIFUL Charming Roses in profusion that anybody can grow in any climate and in almost any soil. We will give you a whole garden of them free and they will bloom and bloom all summer, surrounding your home with a veritable paradise of delightful fragrance and radiant colors. The different varieties described below are strong, well-rooted one-year old bushes ready to be transplanted to your garden as soon as you receive them and we guarantee that they will grow and thrive beautifully if given proper care and attention. No matter in what part of the United States you live, our growers will send them to you at the proper time to plant according to the schedule printed below. Please remember, however, that these dates may vary from ten to fifteen days in event of an extremely early or late spring, so you need not become anxious if they should not reach you just on the date named in schedule. The rose growers who supply us are perfectly familiar with planting conditions in your locality and you may depend upon them to forward the roses to you at the best time for you to put them in the ground. Following is a brief description of each of the different varieties of beautiful ever-blooming rose bushes given you free on this great offer. Complete instructions on how to plant and care for roses will be included free of charge.

Melody

For years rose growers have tried to produce a genuinely yellow rose, and when this Irish beauty was introduced, it was hailed with delight for it represented a new color in its class and has now become the greatest of all yellow roses for the home planter. It grows to perfection in any ordinary garden soil in all localities and from the time it is planted in the early spring, it bears continuously great numbers of lovely flowers of immense size, which stand out well from the plant, giving it a regal appearance and stamping it as the most extraordinary rose of its color. The color is a lovely shade of yellow, deepening to apricot in the center; in fact, it is a rose of sterling merit, which has proved hardy in all localities.

Frau Karl Druschi

This brilliant rose is renowned as the best snow-white rose ever produced. The foliage is heavy and of rich texture; but the glory of this plant, is its magnificent flowers, huge in size and produced with the greatest freedom on long stiff stems. A single plant will produce hundreds of bloomers, which are full, very deep and double. The color is marvelously white, positively without a suggestion of any tint or shade of color. The fragrance is exquisite; in short this glorious Rose seems to have been endowed with all the charms and grace of the entire rose family.

Maiden's Blush

A beautiful rose for bedding or decorated purposes just recently introduced. It is very vigorous and healthy, hardy enough to withstand all climates and quickly forming a handsome shapely bush the first season planted. It will thrive in most any soil or situation, clothing itself with beautiful ornamental foliage and having the vitality necessary to produce the handsome double flowers all through the season. Everyone exclaims over its exquisite beauty and after having seen it in bloom, we can well appreciate their enthusiasm. The delicate blendings of colors is almost impossible to describe, rose tints in the center of the flower gradually shading off into pale blush and creamy white.

Etoile De France

This rose has been selected from the almost unlimited number of hardy red roses, because it seems the acme of perfection. The bush grows upright, covered with beautiful, bronzy, green foliage, which is not subject to insect attack. The growth is so luxuriant and lusty that great masses of beautiful crimson roses are borne all summer. This is one of the finest of all garden roses.

Radiance

This wonderful new everblooming rose is one of the most beautiful varieties ever introduced. We want every lover of beautiful roses to plant Radiance for there is no other like it, either in color, growth, or beauty. It is the ideal garden rose, thriving in practically any soil under the most adverse conditions to a perfection seen in no other rose. The splendid flowers are produced in amazing profusion. They are immense in size, and the color is a beautiful blending of shades of carmine rose with opal and coppery reflections, extremely brilliant in effect, exquisitely beautiful but most difficult to describe. Radiance is the premier garden rose of today, and its numerous charms will delight you.

Red Dorothy Perkins

This is the most valuable addition to the popular class of Rambler roses ever produced. Its magnificent foliage is fine, dark and glossy, remaining intact to unseasonable weather and withstanding all diseases. This quality alone assures an ornamental climber which is nearly evergreen and its graceful pendulous habit will place it first among pillar roses. The marvelous production of bloom is really sensational; it is produced in great clusters; each individual rose being perfect in form and very double, the color being deep intense scarlet which retains its vivid brilliancy as long as the flower lasts.

We will send you twelve of these rose bushes (two of each variety) or six bushes (one of each variety) on the terms of the following special offers:

Comb and Brush

Premium No. 2632

That Will Stand Long, Hard Use

The bristles of this brush are strongly embedded in aluminum-like, bright metal which has a silver luster, so they will stand no end of water without falling out or the back of the brush cracking.

We offer this special premium with confidence, knowing the most exacting people will be pleased to own a good brush and comb that will last for years and keep sweet and clean. The brush is nine inches long and two and one half inches wide of rich, black, ebonized finish, pure white, well filled rows of bristles held firmly in place by the metal which prevents dust and germs from collecting around the bristles. Wet the brush and it cannot spoil or sour like ordinary ones. The comb, seven and one half inches long and one and one half inches wide, with fine and coarse teeth, and being made of special black secret process material, is well named Bull Dog or Unbreakable. When ordering be sure to state that you want Set No. 263.

Club Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents we will send you this Comb and Brush free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 2632.

Boys! Girls! Look—See Who Is Here!

The "Comfort Twins"

American Made Unbreakable Dolls With Life-like Indestructible Composition Heads!

DON'T they look as if they were out for a good time? And wouldn't you like to have them to play with? The little boy's name is Johnnie, his sister's name is Josie and they make the most charming pair of twin dolls you ever saw. They are entirely different from the ordinary doll having a life-like head made of an indestructible composition, a new style cloth body and the latest improved jointed arms and legs which never get out of order. Neither doll can be broken because both head and body are indestructible. They are over a foot tall with rosy cheeks and blue eyes and dressed just as you see them in the picture. Josie has on a cute red-and-white checked dress with a handsome blue sash and trimmed with lace around the neck. Johnnie is dressed in pretty blue-and-white checked rompers with lace trimming and blue belt. You can dress and undress these dolls as often as you please, make them stand up or sit down or bend over and by moving their arms and legs around in different positions you can get them to look exactly as if they were walking, running, stretching out their arms, waving their hands, in fact they will cut up most any antic that might be expected of a real live healthy two-year-old baby boy or girl. They look so life-like in their baby clothes with their happy smiling faces you would almost think they were alive and ready to talk to you in that baby language so dear to the heart of every little doll mother. We are sure no little boy or girl ever had a doll that could furnish quite so much real satisfaction and enjoyment as either one of these two handsome twins. You may have either doll—your choice of either Josie or Johnnie—or both of them free as a COMFORT premium as we have bought a quantity of them to be distributed in this manner. Remember these are real American made unbreakable dolls—not paper "cut-outs" or "rag" dolls—with a strong durable stuffed cloth body, jointed arms and legs and an indestructible composition head that will not break. They will last a long time.

We Will Give You Both Dolls!

FOR seven one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25c each and we will send you both dolls—Josie and Johnnie—free by parcel post prepaid. (Premium No. 7247). Or for four one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each or two 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each we will send you one doll—your choice of Josie (Premium No. 7244), or Johnnie (Premium No. 7254, free by parcel post prepaid. When ordering be sure to give the premium number of doll or dolls wanted.

German Silver Mesh Purse

Premium No. 7362

The Latest Style

Given For Two Subscriptions!

THIS is the new "Gate Top" mesh purse with a ten-inch wrist chain, made throughout of German Silver, handsome, stylish, and perfectly safe for the carrying of money and other valuables. A slight pull with the forefinger of each hand instantly opens the purse, a gentle pressure with thumb and finger closes it. Our illustration shows the purse closed. When open the top is as large as the bottom, or in other words, two inches in diameter. When closed it leaves an opening only three-fourths of an inch wide over which the brightly polished German silver cover snaps down tightly so that the contents of the purse cannot possibly become lost. This dainty purse is now extremely fashionable so we have purchased a quantity for the benefit of those of our lady and girl readers who like to be up-to-date in these little accessories. You can have one of them free by taking advantage of the following

Children's Happy Hour

Matilda and the Frog

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

MATILDA was out playing with her blue and white striped romping suit on one day when suddenly her mamma came to the door and called out:

"Come home dearie, right away. I have a big surprise for you."

Matilda hurried to the house as quickly as she could, and there stood her cousin Ella, whom she had not seen for two years.

My, but they were glad to see each other. For a full minute all you could hear was kissing and joyful cries.

When, at length, their warm greetings were over, the city child said: "Gracious, Tildy, but you have grown."

"So have you," laughed our dolly friend and when they stood back to back and measured they proved to be exactly the same size. Wasn't that queer?

Ella had brought every member of the family a nice present and Tildy's was a pretty basket, made by real Indians. She was so pleased over it that she did not know what to say so she just kissed her cousin again and hugged the basket as if it were a doll.

"It would look beautiful if it were filled with flowers," said her mother and this gave the children an idea.

"Let us go out and fill it," said they, in one breath.

Ella was clad in white and looked just grand, so Matilda slipped off her rompers and put on her pink gingham dress.

"Be careful now," warned her mamma, as they started off toward the garden, "don't go too far and don't be gone more than a half hour."

"All right," they replied, and soon were lost in a tangle of rose bushes.

Every time they tried to pick a rose a big bumble bee would nestle in it and scare them away. Ella grew impatient and scolded them but they buzzed more loudly and she was afraid if she said another cross word they would sting her. At last they found a long branch of a climbing rose lying on the ground and as there were no bees on it, they picked enough to fill their basket. Their fingers were bleeding from the thorns and Ella cried a little and wished she had never come to the country but Tildy consoled her and they went to the lily pond and washed their hands in it and sat down and watched the pretty gold fish frisking about. It was just lovely there but soon, alas! their half hour was up and they had to start for home.

When Ella stooped over to pick up the basket, she screamed in terror, for there, right in the middle of their nice bouquet was an ugly frog. Oh, it was dreadful. Neither one would pick up the basket and the horrid intruder refused to hop out of it.

At last Matilda thought of a scheme. They got a long branch and ran it under the handle and each picked up an end and carried the flowers that way. When they had gone a little distance they could hear Tildy's mother calling so they started to run. All excitement, they tried to tell her about the frog, but when she looked in the basket it was not there.

"See," said the mother, "you thought it awful because you were scared but the truth is, the poor frog was scared, too, and just ran away for its life."

Paste the entire picture on a piece of cardboard (using boiled flour paste) and smooth, with the hands, from the center towards the edges. Put it in a large book to dry and let it remain there at least three hours. Cut out each dress and hat with scissors and color them with crayons, chalk or water colors. The romping suit should be striped blue and white; the flour suit should be pink with red flowers; the basket brown and the flowers in it pink and red with green leaves; the traveling suit has a red coat and yellow striped skirt. The hats match the suits. The little extending tabs are bent back to hold the dresses on and the dotted line on each hat is slit through, with a knife, and then pressed down over the head to hold it on. The ends of the strip upon which the doll stands is bent back at the ends, to make the doll stand alone.

The Order Of the Black Eagle

"I SHOULD like to know," said a man of diplomatic experience, "just how January 17th and the following Sunday were celebrated in Berlin this year. I have seen no mention of it in any of the newspapers and I fancy there was not as much doing in that line this year as during peace years. On the 17th occurs the celebration of the founding of the Order of the Black Eagle, the highest in Prussia and the most coveted order in all Germany. This order was founded in 1701 and includes only one class, conferring hereditary nobility and the rank of knight and lieutenant general. It is the only order in which the original idea of the order of chivalry is unchanged. Every year on the date named the Chapter is solemnly assembled and all knights created during the previous year are officially received. This is really a magnificent display of that pomp and panoply of which the Kaiser is so inordinately fond and nothing is omitted that will add to its gorgeousness. To the reception all the great functionaries of the court, all generals, admirals, ministers, princes and the entire entourage that goes to make up the splendor of empire in its capital are invited and all appear unless absolutely prevented. In fact, nothing short of Providence can keep them away. And everybody must wear all the gold and glitter that can be hung upon him. Guests of the very highest rank are invited at high noon, the others of lesser rank coming at a quarter before twelve. When all are assembled, the Master of Ceremonies—in my time he was that Count Eulenberg who afterwards retired in disgrace, you may remember—informs the Kaiser who puts on the mantle of the Order in an adjoining apartment, and, preceded by the princes, goes into the room where all the knights are ranged in pairs, the younger ones to the front and they are presented to their Emperor. Then the grand procession is formed and marches to the Hall of the Knights, where the display is simply dazzling. The most megatherian and spectacularly splendiferous circus parade ever seen in this country is a drab compared with it. Here the Kaiser in the brilliant red mantle of velvet worn by the knights ascends the throne to a fanfare of trumpets and the investiture of the knights proceeds, each step more glittering than the next. Each new knight puts on the red mantle when he is fully invested, the Kaiser puts the collar of the Order around his neck, consecrates and embraces him and he is turned over to his fellow knights for their congratulations. During all this ceremony the Kaiser stands bareheaded on the steps of the throne and the trumpeters never let up a minute. When this is over the Kaiser and his knights proceed to the Chapter Hall where a meeting behind closed doors is held, the Kaiser presiding, after which there is a banquet attended only by knights of the Order.

"So much for the Black Eagle direct. Then on the Sunday following comes as a supplement to it the celebration of the Coronation and of the Order which takes place at the Imperial Palace and is a popular affair participated in by all classes of society. All who already wear orders are present and the newly decorated receive the insignia of the various orders, the ladies being assembled in a special room where they receive the order of Louise. All this is done in the anterooms of the palace and from these the guests go to the chapel where seats are reserved for them. Then enters the Kaiser preceded by the Master of Ceremonies, pages, and great Court officials. He is accompanied by the Empress. A chapel service follows after which the guests return to the ante-rooms. All the newly decorated pass before the Emperor and Empress bowing as they move along. Next comes a big dinner in the White Hall where as many as a thousand guests may be present and it is the most democratic affair which is known in Prussian official circles for guests are seated without reference to rank and a Lieutenant-general may elbow a night watchman or an Admiral be side by side with a mechanic and they eat together and talk together on the friendliest terms. Of course, at the imperial table there is not so much informality. After the dinner, speech-making is in order and this is one of the times when the Kaiser becomes a spell-binder and a spread-eagle orator to his infinite delight. When this is all done, and it is not soon over, a social season winds it up with everybody having a word or two with the crowned heads and going home with all sorts of leavings from the tables to take to the children. The spirit of this dinner is just about as far removed from the spirit of the Black Eagle as could be imagined, yet nobody seems to see any incongruity in it. On the contrary they seem to think the autocracy of the Eagle makes possible the democracy of the dinner, which you must know is peculiarly a German sense of proportion.

"As I said in the beginning, I fancy the celebration this year was not as it was in peace years, and I am pretty certain, even if there were any celebration at all, that the dinner part of it was omitted for obvious reasons."

FIRST SHIP AUCTION IN U. S.—Two ships under construction were sold at auction in New York, one to the Russian-American line for the sum of $500,000; and the other, a cargo steamer, to the Universal Transportation Co., for $600,000. This was the first ship auction ever held in the United States.

COTTON BOLL-WEEVIL.—Despite the most careful and intelligent methods of cotton cultivation, the boll-weevil pest is gradually spreading into new territory at the rate of about 50 miles each year. The advance is toward the east and north. It is feared that the entire cotton section will become infested before a way is found to stamp out the pest effectually.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Slim Jim, Sebastopol, Cal.—What the nature of a skin disease is can only be determined by a physician who can examine it personally, so you must go to a doctor to know if you have eczema, and if you have, what kind it is and what treatment is necessary. (2) Ask him about the pain around your heart. Guessing at it we should say it was indigestion, which also causes fainting spells in aggravated cases. Indeed, there are few things indigestion will not do to make the human lot worse than it is, and in the vast majority of cases the humans are to blame for having indigestion. A little care in prevention by proper food and eating and nearly every human being would never have indigestion. Possibly you may not have indigestion; we are only guessing, but the doctor who sees you can tell and be sure to ask him all you have asked us.

A. C. W., Minot, N. Dak.—We do not know the preparation, but as it is put out by a thoroughly reliable company, and is oil it will act as a lubricant and laxative. We prefer vegetable to mineral oil, but any oil is more or less laxative, if taken in quantity.

Mrs. W. W., Steelton, Pa.—Lemon juice being an acid is supposed to be useful in rheumatic disorders and to a slight extent, possibly, this may be true, but the excessive use of lemon juice may cause precipitation of uric acid and thus produce stone in the bladder. When you add cream of tartar, more acid, and then follow the direction of your friend, evidently not a physician, and drink as much of it in hot water every day as you can, the chances are that you will be dead long before you can cure the rheumatism. A little lemon juice before meals in a glass of hot or cold water will check the formation of acid and relieve or prevent acidity of the stomach, and lemonade, unsweetened, is a refreshing drink in feverish conditions, but gulping down large quantities of it as your friend suggests will not do your rheumatism much good. As rheumatism is thus far practically incurable, why don't you consult a doctor and learn of something for its prevention and relief? That would be the sensible thing to do.

X. Y. Z., Brese, Ill.—You are another one of the COMFORT blind folks who will not see that your eyes are too valuable to be treated by an ignorant person when they are not in a healthy condition. Only a physician who can examine them can tell what treatment is necessary and you must see a physician, or presently you can't see anything. When you see him ask him about the other ailments.

Mrs. J. D. W., East Tallahassee, Ala.—For the chafed and itching places under your arms try cocoa-butter, rubbed in thoroughly night and morning. Get it in a half pound cake at your drug-store. It's a good family remedy to use on the skin of grown-ups and children. Talcum powder is also good for the chafing, but you cannot use it very successfully if you use the butter.

Inquirer, Norwood, Ga.—Try the juice of half a lemon in a glass of hot water before meals, or a pinch of soda in half a glass of hot water after meals, and if the regurgitation continues, you will have to diet yourself and put into your stomach only such food as it can digest.

Mrs. J. W., Carlisle, Ky.—As between Florida and Arizona climate for catarrh, we should recommend Arizona as the air is much drier there and dry air is the remedy for catarrh. What the expense would be depends upon yourself, but you could not safely start with less than two hundred dollars, if you intended merely to go there and come back again. What you should do is to move to Arizona and stay there, for there is no cure for catarrh but climate.

Mrs. C. R., Whitestone, N. Y.—The intermittent partial paralysis of your daughter's arm is due to disordered nerves, we should say, from this distance. What causes the nerve disorder we will not guess at and you should take her to a hospital in New York City and have the experts there give her the proper examination and treatment. The longer you delay the more difficult it will be to restore her to a normal condition.

A. C., Stamford, Conn.—If your hands are so fat that it makes you clumsy in playing the piano, you should consult a music teacher who probably has had just such cases to treat. Constant practise we should think would reduce the flesh, as it will in other parts of the body, and frequent massaging might do some good, but ask the music teacher first.

S. R., Columbia, Tenn.—The recurrent pain in your calves and not elsewhere may be a form of rheumatism, but this could only be determined by the personal examination of a physician. You know that while rheumatism may affect any part of the body, it is merely the expression there, of something out of order somewhere else and there is where you must go to remove the cause, which sometimes may be removed and sometimes not. (2) The only cure, if there is a cure, for catarrh is climate and if you live in a catarrhal climate and have catarrh no medicine will do anything for it except temporary relief. The climate being the cause you must get away from the cause. Go where the air is the driest, hot or cold, as you please.

H. M. R., Farina, Ill.—You are another one of those COMFORT mothers who think they know more about the treatment of ailing children than any doctor does, and you are doing your utmost to ruin the future health prospects of your child. Take the little one to a physician and get the proper advice and treatment. If you don't, the child will strangle some day and it will be your fault.

Brown Eyes, Pendleton, Ky.—If your examining oculist told you your eyes were all right, why are you so anxious to try the various remedies suggested by ignorant persons? You need treatment of sight other than eyesight.

A. J., McLeansboro, Ill.—The only cure for tuberculosis that COMFORT knows of is diet and right living conditions and we cannot give that to you in specific terms in the space we have. Many persons with consumption not too far advanced have arrested its development, have been cured and lived out their allotted time by following the rules of modern treatment. A change of climate may be beneficial. Thus far no medicinal remedy for consumption has been discovered, though scientists have given it more study, than any other disease to which flesh is heir. The treatment is well known. Consult your doctor or go to a tuberculosis sanitarium.

Worried, Ravenna, Nebr.—Some people have some slight coughing through most of their lives and nothing much comes of it, except annoyance and a little discomfort. Whether such coughs could have been prevented at the beginning, nobody knows and so long as no serious results follow, nobody seems to care. But when such coughs develop into other throat troubles, bronchitis, especially, it is time to take notice. Bronchitis is painful and dangerous in its severe forms and it sometimes goes into consumption. The home treatment and the strange medicines that you ask about are not proper treatment and you owe it to your own comfort and safety to have a physician, after careful examination, prescribe for you properly. The pains in the lungs are mild symptoms of disorder which should be attended to in time. They are not dangerous, but are warnings of danger. Go to your doctor for his advice and follow it strictly.

Mrs. T. B., Winthrop, Ark.—Your husband is troubled with what is sometimes called "winter itch," the legs and often the arms itching in most annoying fashion and appearing only in cold weather. It is caused by irritation of the nerve terminals on the skin and a remedy that seldom fails is cocoa-butter, an excellent skin food at all times. Get a half pound cake at the drug-store and rub it on the skin night and morning, or at any time if the itching shows itself. Relief follows quickly and the butter will keep the itching in check as long as it is used. Many elderly people are troubled with this itching in cold weather and cocoa-butter should be kept in the house for handy use. It costs about fifty cents a half pound in city drug-stores.

Mrs. H. F., Plant City, Fla.—You will never get rid of your catarrh in Florida where you were born to it. If your husband is a good carpenter and a steady man he will have no trouble in finding work in Arizona or Colorado and you should go to either one of those states where the air is dry. Don't sell your Florida place, but rent it and try the dry air climate. You can't be told what place is best for your health and his work, and you will have to go and find out for yourself.

Mrs. L. C., Montezuma, Iowa.—There is no specific remedy for nervousness because nervousness is due to so many causes that no one remedy will apply. Strictly speaking there is no remedy and the only treatment is by a physician who can learn what by examination the cause is and treat that. Your feet burn and feel creepy as a result of disordered nerve terminals, but nothing much can be done until the cause of the disorder is known and the proper treatment prescribed.

The Biggest 25c Worth in the World! Are you Interested in Bargains? Two Million Words—for 25c

My dear friend:

If your best friend discovers a REAL BARGAIN—doesn't she tell you about it?

I think she does—and I think she, or some other friend, will be glad if you will tell HER of the biggest, best, 25c worth in the whole world—A YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO COMFORT.

* * * * * * * * * *

Take this March issue for example—then take ANY OTHER magazine at any price. Oh, yes, some of the more expensive ones are printed on shiny paper and have multi-colored covers and advertisements. But COMPARE the READING MATTER of COMFORT with the 50c and 75c magazines—story by story, department by department. Compare the amount of matter, the number of pages, the size of the pages, and then ask yourself "Compared with COMFORT, are these higher priced magazines even of EQUAL VALUE?"

* * * * * * * *

Let's make a comparison. The March 1917 issue of COMFORT isn't completed as this is being written, but take the last March issue which was the same size, and compare the amount of matter in it with that in a prominent 50c magazine and with that in another which is now 50c but is soon going to 75c.

(The figures given represent the number of words in an issue. For instance, in the regular monthly departments COMFORT carried 66,224 words in March—over ten times as many as one of the others, etc.)

	COMFORT	One 50c mag.	Other 50c mag.
Regular dept's run every month	66,224 words	6,557 words	13,743 words
Continued stories	26,690 "	7,291 "	9,605 "
Short stories	5,557 "	7,339 "	9,921 "
Useful articles—articles telling how to make work easier.	15,979 "	6,102 "	6,217 "
Articles of general interest.	5,823 "	3,421 "	3,030 "
Total number of WORDS in issue	120,273	30,710	42,516

Notice that in this issue COMFORT gives its readers a lot more matter than BOTH the others put together—and notice especially how much more continued stories, regular monthly departments and helpful articles COMFORT gives—nearly FOUR times as much of this matter as EITHER ONE.

* * * * * * * * *

Once we kept a record for a year of the number of words of reading matter in COMFORT and in all the other monthlies that cost as LITTLE as COMFORT. Our magazine carried TWO MILLION words that year All but three or four of the others were over a MILLION words BEHIND COMFORT—think of that—50% behind!—and some of them did not even have one quarter as much.

* * * * * * * * *

Yes, and the QUALITY of our reading matter is even MORE remarkable than the QUANTITY.

It has ever been the purpose of COMFORT to be USEFUL as well as entertaining—to make a magazine that would be essential to the health, prosperity and happiness of its readers. Through years of experimenting, eighteen regular departments have been developed, each in answer to a vital need among our people and all combining with the fiction and the educational articles to make COMFORT a magazine of supreme value and service to its subscribers.

* * * * * * * * *

Just take this March issue. It has EIGHTEEN regular, monthly departments. No magazine at anywhere near COMFORT'S price has anywhere near as many—OR AS GOOD.

Turn to pages 24 and 25 in this issue and note there the two big pages of tatting and crocheting submitted by COMFORT'S workers, edited by Mrs. Wheeler Wilkinson—with 17 fine illustrations. This department describes new things to make, teaches crocheting, knitting, sewing and all kinds of needlecraft.

And note the cooking articles—those in the regular COMFORT'S Sisters' Corner (a mothers' department—and something more, a community of interests section, a forum in which our women readers discuss topics of public interest and matters pertaining to the home)—together with the special articles: Uncle Sam Tells How to Feed the Children (illustrated) and Fish—How to Select and Cook it (illustrated.)

Another strong monthly feature is the fashion department—on pages 16 and 17 of the March issue.

Note that this issue has eight useful articles—articles telling its subscribers how to live easier, pleasanter, more efficient lives—treating of such subjects as Efficiency in the Kitchen, A Sweet Pea Venture, Household Conveniences, Short Cuts in House Cleaning, Use of Paint on the Farm, etc., etc.

In this issue there are four continued stories—and every installment a BIG one, three short stories, two fine feature articles—yes, and the Wheel-Chair Department—itself a monthly feature through which COMFORT has, with the help of its subscribers, given away 395 wheel chairs to deserving cripples. Also don't forget Uncle Charie's League of Cousins banded together, under COMFORT guidance for mutual help.

Even the cover is used to advantage, not to carry a "pretty" picture but to show illustrations of the article about kitchen efficiency—pictures that are helpful and entertaining.

* * * * * * * * *

Through the twenty-eight busy and happy years I have been publishing COMFORT I have never before written my subscribers a letter of just this sort.

I do NOT do it how because I NEED subscriptions—for this has been the MOST successful year of our history in getting subscriptions and renewals.

I do it because there is always room for a friend's friend on my subscription list—and because I want to get their names there before I am forced to RAISE the subscription price. This rise in price MUST COME SOON, I am afraid Paper has doubled in price—so has ink. Labor is costing more. So is every item that goes into the publishing of a magazine. Hundreds—yes THOUSANDS of publications have raised their subscription price since the war started. I do not care to reduce the size of COMFORT or lower its quality. So it may be that I shall soon have to RAISE THE PRICE.

You are conferring a favor on your friends to get them to subscribe while the price is still 25c a year.

And I think they will want to subscribe. If so, perhaps you will find the blank below convenient in sending in the subscription.

Your friend, W. H. GANNETT.

PLEASE SEND THE SUBSCRIPTION IN ON THIS BLANK

I well know that lots who read the above letter have never asked ANYBODY to subscribe to ANYTHING in all their lives.

You do not have to begin now. Just take the copy of COMFORT you now hold in your hand—lay it down before your friend and say just these words: "You can get THIS MAGAZINE TODAY for JUST 25c a year."

Won't you get their subscription—without asking?

In return, I will gladly send you, free and prepaid, any one-subscription premium you may care to choose from COMFORT or any of our catalogs. But I think you will do it even more as a FAVOR TO A FRIEND than to earn a premium. I think you will do it because you want some friend to share the amusement, instruction, help and happiness that can be derived from a year's subscription to COMFORT.

Please be sure to tell your friend that COMFORT is designed to amuse and entertain, to please and educate, but chiefly that it is designed to HELP—to show every subscriber how to live a better, fuller, happier life. Tell them that COMFORT publishes nearly TWO MILLION USEFUL WORDS of reading matter each year—for a price of only 25c.

Dear Mr. Gannett, I am enclosing 25c to pay for a one-year subscription to COMFORT for: onlookers this will present one of the most appealing and popular features of the parade—these little maids with their rosy cheeks and bright eyes so full of enthusiasm and so earnest about doing their best. Then will follow women's organizations from all over the country with their banners, which joined the Woman's Wilson Union for this purpose, and the women employees of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Preceding each governor, a float carrying state coat of arms and representing the activities of the state or in some way characteristic of it will be wonderfully attractive. These were planned, and will be provided and equipped by the women of the states, it being the original idea to have all of the forty-eight states thus represented, but on account of conditions, the committee were gratified to have such a display from the states which voted for the President. Altogether the Woman's section will be a distinct and pleasing feature and serve to show the results of energetic cooperation on the part of the women interested who receive no financial help save what they raise themselves.

Floats representing the playground activities of the children of the District and those from the various civic organizations, the munitions plants, the children representing the efforts of the Child Labor people in freeing the youngsters from the horrors of the factories and mills, the various men's political organizations are to be much the same as in many previous parades, but spectators will feel a pang of regret in not seeing Col. William F. Cody's (Buffalo Bill) familiar figure on horseback with the delegation of Indians from the reservation at St. Francis, South Dakota.

Among the other notable features of this parade, many of which have come to be recognized as an essential part of every four-year ceremonial are the Annapolis cadets, West Pointers, Virginia Military Institute delegation, the Washington High School cadets, of whom there are fifteen hundred this time with their own band; about two thousand Tammany Hall members, and various Indian delegations in their native garb.

Pennsylvania, along with its state delegation and its governor, is to send a snappy little Boy Scout band from Lewiston. To liven the step of these marching hosts five hundred bands will discourse music and here, there, everywhere the busy Washington Boy Scouts will be on duty, serving as guides, guards, messengers, aids to police and physicians as well as doing endless duty in first aid.

Still other notable features which will claim a large share of attention will be the organized state militia and District National Guards just back from Mexico, also the Civil War veterans and Spanish war soldiers.

Greater efforts than ever have been devoted to the construction of the Court of Honor and the evening fireworks display.

The Court of Honor, which will extend from the Treasury to the State Department Building, with stands on both sides of the avenue from Madison to Jackson places, is to be most beautiful and artistic. The design accepted was made by a local architect and the treatment is classic throughout, formed by a series of columns on both sides of the street and festoons of evergreens and electric lights connecting them. Tall columns of elaborate design with smaller, simpler ones form a series. The larger units consist of a base supporting four columns, surmounted by an entablature. Projecting above it a staff from which will flutter a flag. In the center of the columns a small cedar tree of conventional shape and an urn holding vines and flowers surmount the smaller units. On both sides of the avenue at the intersection of Madison and Jackson places are large arches of classic design, the arch openings being of sufficient size to permit the passage of vehicles. The portion of the stand occupied by the President in reviewing the parade is even more elaborate for there the design follows the lines of the portico of the White House, fluted columns supporting a pediment.

The mounted escort to the parade will be worthy of note. Each U. S. Senator was requested to designate two men or women to represent his state in this mounted section. Civic and trade organizations and churches were asked to supply four persons to represent their organizations. This section supplies its own mounts and paraphernalia, all very interesting and effective.

On inauguration night Washington will be a veritable electric fairyland. A daylight of electricity will bathe the public buildings all of which will bear only the Stars and Stripes as decoration instead of various flags of other nations as in the past, and millions of arc lights, incandescent lights, and giant searchlights will make the city most brilliant while the avenue will be one continuous blaze of brilliancy and color. The fireworks on the grounds of the Monument will be marvels of pyrotechnic skill and art.

The most interesting of all new features of this inauguration will be the marvelous exhibit of government department activities. By joint resolution of both houses of Congress the executive department and various establishments of the government in Washington were authorized to give an exhibit from Feb. 26 to March 10 of their activities and methods of transacting business. Dubbed, "Uncle Sam at Work," this is to be arranged and managed by the various chiefs of the departments assisted by the Federation of Citizens' Association of Washington. Among the exhibits are rare growths, freaks of fruit of the vegetable world from the Department of Agriculture, displays from the Indian service, Bureau of Education, Reclamation service, pension bureau, bureau of mines, patent office. The Treasury Department shows paper money and stamp making, the making of the gold and silver coins at the mints and also a collection of counterfeits. The life-saving methods of the Coast Guard are shown and all the wonderful displays of the museums are enlightening and educational. The Dead Letter Office, with its freaks of the mails, is another popular feature and the War Department presents the always interesting methods of defense, destructive engines of war and the variety of uniforms worn by our soldiers since the Revolution. The Navy department shows the models of our dreadnoughts, battleships, submarines and other fighting craft. The purpose of this and the invitation sent out by Congress to the people of the United States to visit Washington at this Inaugural and become acquainted with the workings of the government, was for the education of the masses in the things they should know about their own government. To aid in this most worthy project all of the trunk line railroads have extended the time limit of their reduced tickets so that all visitors may tarry in the Capital from a week to ten days.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN.

How to Deal with Exhorbitant Food Prices Is a Problem of Vital Consequence

RECENT food riots in New York and other large cities in which mobs of infuriated women, mostly of foreign extraction, have attacked the stalls of the provision dealers and the push-carts of the street vendors of vegetables, destroying their goods by sprinkling them with kerosene or dumping them into the street, though not a proper or effective method of lowering prices, should serve as a warning that something must be done to relieve the stress of the present situation and prevent a recurrence of such conditions.

Although there is a scarcity of some kinds of food due to partial crop failure, there is plenty of good, nourishing food in this country to feed all our people, and there is no necessity or justification for the exorbitant prices that city people have to pay. Under present abnormal conditions, caused by the world war, prices of all commodities necessarily range higher than usual because of decreased production, increased consumption, higher wages, scarcity of laborers and diminished purchasing power of the dollar consequent on the enormous influx of gold from abroad; but all these causes combined do not account for the excessively high food prices now prevailing. Market manipulation by speculators and middlemen's profits and expenses are responsible for far too great a part of the price paid by the consumer for the necessaries of life.

The fault is with our bungling, extravagant and inefficient system of distribution which results regularly in making the consumer pay for farm produce more than three times as much as the farmer receives for it. To be exact, on the average the farmer receives only thirty cents on the dollar of the retail price for which his produce is sold at the stores while the other seventy cents goes to middlemen whose handling adds nothing to the value of the goods. That is bad enough, but if there happens to be a short crop or a prospect of an unusually large demand the speculators step in and by cornering the market drive prices up to satisfy their own greed.

The Federal and State authorities are pursuing their usual fruitless investigations and all manner of absurd and ineffectual measures are being urged as remedies for these evils, and among others that the speculators be prosecuted, that the exportation of food be prohibited, that the government seize the food supplies, that the cities establish municipal markets and go into the grocery business, that the government regulate food prices, that the farmers strain every effort to plant and raise as large crops as possible and that the city people turn their back yards and vacant city lots into vegetable gardens, and that, in aid of this last project, school gardens be established and the children be instructed in gardening.

In the interest of thrift, economy and morality and as a means of healthful recreation and profitable employment of leisure hours of parents and children let all the back yards and vacant city lots be planted and cultivated; let us have the school gardens and school instruction in gardening. Idleness during the long summer vacation is one of the demoralizing influences that the city child has to contend with, and the care of the garden will help to solve that problem and may prove interesting enough to keep the father away from the saloon after work hours. These objects make it well worth while besides value of the produce in supplying the table and cutting down the cost of living. This is excellent as far as it goes but it will not go far in beating the middlemen and speculators.

The theorists who urge the farmers for the general good of the community to plant every acre possible this spring should understand that this is not such a simple proposition as it seems. It involves extra expenditure for labor, seed and fertilizer. Fertilizer and hired labor are costly and the latter is scarce and maybe not obtainable, and with the hazard of crop failure and the danger of ruinously low prices in case of excessively large crops where is the inducement for the farmer to incur the risk of the extraordinary expense of planting and cultivating an exceptionally large acreage? The other propositions are too fantastic to merit serious consideration.

The one rational method of solving the problem, now and for all time, is to cut out the useless middlemen which incidentally will abolish the speculators. And the only practical way to do this is for the farmers to organize everywhere and market all their products exclusively through cooperative stores and selling agencies of their own to be established in all the cities and large towns. This would leave no opportunity for speculators to operate, and it would give the farmers a larger profit and the consumer lower prices by dividing between them the excessive profits of the middlemen and extinguishing their needless expense.

Agricultural Interests Need Organizing

AGRICULTURE is the largest, most important and most poorly organized industry in the United States. The good work of the Grange deserves universal and hearty support but it needs to be supplemented by more thorough and extensive organization through local, county and other subsidiary unions of farmers, for the better protection of their rights and the promotion of their interests along certain special lines. Cooperation is the key note of success in any business and most of all in farming.

The citrous fruit growers' association of California and the apple growers' association of the Northwest have proved the value of cooperation in standardizing and marketing farm produce; grain elevators owned and operated by associated farmers are profitable to their owners and make the communities in which they exist independent of the speculators, and official reports show that the farmers in certain localities have saved a large per cent of cost by cooperative buying of commercial fertilizer, stock feed and other materials requisite for agricultural operations. There should be a market expert attached to the Agricultural Department of each State, as there is in some States, for the special duty of instructing and assisting the farmers' cooperative associations in buying and selling. The "county agents" are rendering valuable service in impressing the farmers with the importance of cooperation in all their activities. Carl Vrooman, U. S. Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, recently said:

"These county agents are teaching the farmers how to build a new civilization out in our rural communities—a civilization based upon a greater principle than that on which the past has builded; a civilization built on the great principle of cooperation; cooperation of farmer with farmer, neighbor with neighbor, of farmer with business man. The great practical advance in agriculture can no more be realized and brought to fruition by the Ishmaelite and the individualistic, than an individual could create a great metropolis like New York. The farmer of the future just like the urban dweller of the future must have the social vision, must realize he is a man living in a community with other men and must work together with those other men in pursuance of their common interests.

"I know that farmers are suspicious. Each of them thinks the other has shortcomings, and of course they are right. Very often farmers refuse to work together on that account, but more and more they are coming to learn that a man who is a real man is willing to take a chance upon the fundamental honesty and feeling of fair play of his fellow men, to get together with them and work out their common destiny with the same enthusiasm that in the past they have put into their individualistic enterprises.

"When our farmers and bankers and our business men and all of our other citizens are able to get a national point of view, arising to a national consciousness of the possibilities before the American people, possibilities which were never equalled in the history of the world, to the possibilities which in the last fifteen months have increased a thousand per cent, they will discern a new land of promise. When they get to looking at those problems from a social point of view and learn to subordinate their own little, petty, personal, selfish ambitions, in other words, when we as a nation have learned to dominate the hog and tiger in our nature and be human beings, patriotic human beings, then there will clear up before us vistas of wealth, vistas of opportunities compared with which everything in the past is as twilight and shadow."

Arming Our Merchant Ships

SINCE January 31, when Germany proclaimed ruthless and indiscriminate war on neutral shipping, the steamers of our large transatlantic fleet have remained tied at their docks in dread of threatened attack by German submarines, and in consequence our European mail service is interrupted, our foreign commerce is paralyzed and our railroad freight traffic is impeded by the congestion of loaded freight cars that can not be discharged at the seaport terminals. This blockade of American commerce has become intolerable, and to break it the President has ordered the Navy Department to arm our merchant ships with guns and provide them with gun crews for their protection against German submarines, and on March 12 officially announced this to be the policy of our government. If Germany persists in carrying her threat into execution the first meeting of an armed American merchant ship with a German submarine will precipitate war between the two nations—and this is likely to happen before this edition reaches our readers. Our ships will use their arms only in self-defense, and therefore the grave responsibility of choosing between war and peace still rests with Germany.

The Liquor Forces Lose Another Trench

CONGRESS closed its recent session without taking final action on a large number of important measures which should have been adopted, but it did enact two laws which will have a far-reaching effect in curtailing the illegal traffic in intoxicating liquor One is the so-called "Bone Dry Law" which forbids, under severe penalties of fine and imprisonment, the shipment or transportation of intoxicating liquor from any part of this country into any State that prohibits the manufacture and sale of liquor. Liquor to be used for mechanical, medicinal or sacramental purposes is excepted.

The weak point in all our State prohibitory laws has been that liquor dealers in another State were privileged, under the laws of the United States, to ship as much liquor as they chose into a prohibition State regardless of State laws to the contrary, with the result that the liquor dealers, distillers and brewers in the wet States have done a thriving mail-order business in supplying intoxicants to the residents of the dry States. This nuisance will cease when the new Federal law goes into effect on the first day of next July and Uncle Sam exercises his mighty power over interstate commerce in aid of the enforcement of State prohibitory laws. The twenty-two States which have adopted prohibition laws will then become dry in fact as well as in name. The other law supplements the foregoing by forbidding the use of the mails for circulating liquor advertisements or soliciting liquor business in prohibition States.

The Sermon on the Mount

By Joseph F. Novak

See front cover illustration.

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

"Christ hath arisen! Oh, mountain peaks, attest—
Witness resounding glen and torrent wave!
The immortal courage in the human breast
Sprung from that victory—tell how oft the brave
To camp midst rock and cave,
Nerved by those words their struggling faith have borne,
Planting the cross on high above the clouds of morn!"

Mrs. Hemans:—Easter Day in a Mountain Churchyard.

WITH hands clasped to his temples, Vandeventer Peyton sat at his desk, his thoughts garish, his eyes wild. Down below in the street, he heard the yelling of newsboys announcing the crash of the Western Investing Syndicate. Wasn't it a nightmare, or something of the sort? Surely it could not be true! Surely the Syndicate which he had formed, financed and promoted was not really up against the wall! It could not be! Yet that was what the boys in the street were yelling about.

It meant that he had failed, that at twenty-eight his life was a wreck. Could he withstand the sneers and jeers of the men whom he had defied when they attempted to thwart him? They had succeeded in doing what they had threatened, and when his own money gave out at the crucial time, confidence of the stockholders in the Syndicate went too, quarreling arose in their ranks, legal barriers were thrown up, not destructive in themselves, but which would require lawsuits to remove.

He had sought to borrow money on the property of the Syndicate, for its assets were well in excess of its liabilities, but his endeavors had been in vain, and without money in a thing of that sort, all other endeavor is useless.

From the looks of things, the only plan seemed to be to abandon the project, let his successors snatch the fruit of his labor, while he could have the pleasure of beginning all over again.

The horror of it! The horror of being obliged to do that! But need he? Only a little brute courage was needed, one little commandment needed to be forgotten, and the turmoil of life would be over.

He sat up. Why hadn't he made up his mind to that before? Yes, he'd do it. Tonight he could settle what few matters he had in hand and as for the Syndicate, the courts would take care of that. He hoped that when the stockholders and the world in general found out that his scheme was a legitimate one, and that the crash was the result of his enemies' plot, those who wronged him might enjoy a little conscientious drubbing—if indeed they did possess such things as consciences.

His mind was beginning to be unbalanced, yet his actions for the next half hour would not have been evidence of it, for with his usual alertness, he glanced over sundry papers, checking up a column of figures here, making a note there.

When everything was arranged to his satisfaction, he drew forth some stationery, and picking up his pen, he prepared himself to write.

To only one person, and that was Lucille.

Lucille! She came to him then, in his mind's eye, in all the beauty of her young womanhood. How he loved her, and how vividly he now recalled the day she had promised to be his. But she had been reared in luxury and certainly he could not hold her to her engagement, when he was a poor man, a bankrupt, and a failure. It would not be just to her. She possessed too great a fortune in her own right to expect her to give it up, and he would not allow himself to be supported by her means.

He knew too, why she loved him; it was for his strength, his aggressiveness, his push, his fearlessness, and the fact that he was looked upon as a man who was constantly doing great things. He had always been rated a success—and now this!

But he would end it all.

Through the windw which faced the west, the dusky sunbeams of an April sun penetrated. The dusty, fiery globe was sinking to the horizon, so significant of the setting of the sun of his success, he thought. A soft breeze came in, soft yet somewhat polluted with the conglomerated smells of city streets. But it held the promise of spring, and the revivication of the earth.

He watched the sun until it finally disappeared, then in the twilight, he wrote his letter.

"Dear Lucille:

"When you receive this, I shall be where the trials of life do not vex us. My shame at my disgrace, unmerited, has unnerved me, and I cannot face life. If I were really guilty of intentional wrong doing, I might brazen it out, the swindler is always awaiting the day of his undoing, but being as I am, innocent, a thing which no one will believe, I take this means of making men forget. One flare of sensationalism, and all will be over.

"Do not mourn for me, dearest. I cannot ask you to share my disgrace, nor shall I. To live without you, I cannot.

"I shall be found at pretty little Mount Hope. You know the place—it was there I first told you I loved you, and you accepted me. Life began there for me, so shall it end there. Good by, sweetheart, good by, VAN."

When he had done writing, he folded the letter deliberately, and put it into an envelope and placed it in his pocket. He put on his light overcoat, and stood for a moment in the semi-darkness of his office, looking about for the last time. That office! Sometimes he had almost hated it and yet now he felt as if he were leaving an old friend. Then he went out, locked the door and stepped into the elevator and soon was in the street.

There was the feel of spring in the air, and the streets were damp and somewhat muddy. The light breeze was changing to a high wind, brisk, but warm nevertheless.

He walked along as if in a daze until he came to a glistening front of a florist shop. Within the electric-lighted depths of its windows were banks of blooming Easter lilies, together with many other brilliant blooming plants.

Easter! Easter lilies! He had forgotten that on the morrow, nearly two thousand years ago, the world's Redeemer had risen. It had always been his custom to send Lucille a floral token of the day, and he had almost forgotten to do so on this, the last chance he would have. But fortunately the matter was brought to his mind, and he went to the open door.

As he did so, he nearly upset a little midget in nondescript clothes who had been admiring the beautiful lilies banked in the window. He noted her longing look.

"Would you like one of the lilies, child?" he asked.

She looked up at him shyly and bashfully chewed a handkerchief which might once have been white.

"I dunno," she managed to ejaculate.

"Well, come, I'll buy you one," he answered, and taking her by the hand, they went into the shop where he bade her make a selection. He refused to buy the little one she timidly pointed out, asked her if she wouldn't prefer the great big one with eight glistening lilies crowning a stalk of green leaves, and immediately bought it for her.

Something wrenched his heart as he saw her clasp the big lily tenderly in her small arms, and march away with a face shining with joy.

"I'll make the child happy, if nothing more, before the end," he thought to himself, as he saw her turn a corner and disappear.

Then he ordered a great sheaf of cut lilies sent to Lucille, and that done, he went to his home, located in the suburbs.

After his meal, which he scarcely touched, he sat out upon the piazza of his home, swinging gently to and fro in the porch swing that hung there in the darkness. The day had been unusually warm, and out in the street the children were calling to each other and chasing about, joying in the liberty from winter wraps.

But Vandeventer saw naught of awakening. To him, the hand of fate seemed to be pointing to the other extreme. "The end, the end," the swing seemed to creak drowsily.

At length he tapped a small bell, and Samson, his valet appeared.

"I am going away tomorrow, Samson, and I do not know just when I shall return. I think I had better pay you as I will have to dispense with your services. And by the bye, I want you to carry a letter to Miss Elviert. Here it is," and he placed it in his man's hand.

Samson acknowledged the charge.

"I want the letter delivered at 10 o'clock tomorrow; not a moment earlier, you understand?" His eyes fixed themselves upon the valet who seemed to shudder beneath the penetrating gaze. "You will not forget?"

"I shall remember," the valet said.

"Very well," Vandeventer replied. "I shall depend upon you. Take this for your services; it will keep you until you find new employment. I appreciate your faithfulness, and am sorry that I must dismiss you."

He placed a roll of bills in the man's hands.

"But Mr. Peyton!" expostulated the valet. "This is so sudden; so unusual! Can't you take me with you?"

"No, Samson, it's a journey I must make alone. Good night."

He rose from the porch swing, and without another word went to his room and though he disrobed and threw himself upon his bed, it was not to sleep for his mind was filled with the task he had set for himself, and he lay wide-awake and sleepless during the night as he planned every detail.

Then as the morning grayed, he arose and dressed himself with care. He wondered, if indeed, it were himself contemplating the rash act; he wondered how others had planned the dreadful deed, those others who had gone the same route before.

Finished dressing, he stepped to his dressing table and from it took a revolver. He examined it, then satisfied that it was in shape, he dropped it into his pocket and crossed the room to the window.

Throwing it up high, he looked out.

His home stood at the end of a pretty street laid along the ridge of a small hillock, and from his window he could look afar off over the gardens and lawns which surrounded the suburban homes. These lay sleeping under a soft blue haze, the haze that precedes the coming of the sun. A quiet, mysterious hush lay upon everything; then in the east flashed a red streak, illumining the clouds which took on rainbow tints.

In the distance came a cock's crow, it was answered by another, then came a chorus, which presently died down again.

And now the sun arose for his journey across the sky. The tree tops' tender green quivered in the soft zephyr that sprung up.

As Vandeventer looked, he felt himself on the brink of eternity. And for an hour he stood there, that feeling ever upon him, yet ever lodged in his mind was the dreadful thought of the deed to be done.

He glanced at his watch. It was five o'clock. Tossing it back into his pocket, he left the room.

So engrossed was he that he did not notice that Samson quietly watched him from the deep shadows of the hall.

Vandeventer went through the house which still slept, to the hall, and picked up his hat and cravanette. Putting them on, he went to his garage and soon had his machine's engine panting, and in a few moments more, he was leisurely rolling down the avenue.

The street looked lovely in the fresh spring morning. The terraced lawns were velvety green, and regiments of gay-colored tulips and crocuses colored the earth. In many windows, Easter lilies bloomed, ringing their bells behind the protection of plate glass.

Sweet was the morning; nature had combined those two harmonies, a late Easter and early spring in a country where spring was always early. Lowly dandelions dotted the grass, in the trees the sparrows quarreled, and robins and thrushes whistled and trilled.

"All nature is beginning life, and I am ending it. Ah, well, perhaps just as well in the beauty of the morning, than in the darkness of the night," and the thought caused him to shoot more speed into the car which had been moving along rather slowly.

After an hour of driving, he reached the Mount. It was a pretty little hill, rising majestically to command a view of the surrounding country. Its sides were grass grown, here and there a clump of bushes dotted it, on its crest was a cluster of poplar trees, already well leafed. One of these had been struck by lightning and now lay prostrate, forming a convenient seat.

Vandeventer drove the car into a clump of bushes bursting into leaf, and getting out, slowly walked up into the mount.

Soon he gained the top. From his point of vantage, he could see the road over which he had come, gently undulating here and there, lying white and clean in the sunlight, or losing itself behind a little coppice to appear again in the distance.

He turned from the road, and walked to the other side of the hill which commanded a view of pastoral beauty in which wound the river. He sat down upon the fallen tree, and gazed far off.

Never once had the dreadful thought, the determined resolution left his mind; nor made he any attempt to shake it off.

He felt into his pocket, and in a moment more he held the weapon of death in his hand. The sun glinted on its steel and cast off dazzling glares.

"Quick, have it over with," he murmured to himself. He stood up, threw from him his cravanette, coat and waistcoat. He tore the collar from his neck and bared his breast to the morning breeze. Right at his heart, the seat of life was the place, one muffled shot, perhaps not even a sensation of pain, and it would all be over.

He clutched at the shirt, plucked it away, and the revolver went up to seek its target.

A shrill screaming suddenly rent the air, then a chorus of distressed bird-notes. Distracted, he turned about. A flock of sparrows were chattering on the ground, while in their midst, a bright, but frightened eyed, trembling winged little creature lay pressed to earth.

It had fallen from its nest, and terrorized, it chirped, while the parent birds chattered and beat their wings in their helplessness.

"Poor little creature," he said, as he saw it, and glancing from earth to tree, he saw the nest. "Let me see, what does the Good Book say of you? 'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? And one of them shall not fall on the ground without your father.'"

He laid down the revolver as he spoke, and picked up the little, scarcely fledged creature. It lay warm and trembling in his hand. Softly he stroked it, as it lay winking its bright black eyes at him.

"I guess this was what Christ meant when he spoke of sparrows not falling 'without your father.' Well, back into the nest for you."

As he started for the tree, with intention to climb it, a rushing sound came to him, and he turned as a girl, terror-eyed, rushed to his side.

"Oh, Van, stop!" she cried, catching his wrists. And then, he held his partially opened hands out to her, and she saw that he held just a little fallen sparrow.

"Oh, Van, what are you doing?"

"Just putting a little sparrow back into its nest. 'One of them shall not fall without your father.'"

"What does it mean?" she cried, but Vandeventer only swung himself up to the branch of the tree, and in a moment more, the little sparrow was in his nest again, while the parents chirped in glee.

Now he came down, and to the girl's side. Then suddenly, as if a great light had burst upon him, he drew his hand bewilderedly across his forehead and slowly hid his naked breast and throat.

"Lucille, how did you get here? How did I get here? Ah, that!" and he caught up the revolver.

"Van, Van!" she cried. "Don't!" She caught the weapon from him. "Don't you realize what you are doing?" She dropped the revolver into her bag, then went on, as she wound her arm caressingly about him:

"Samson brought your letter to me this morning after you had left your home. He said you had acted so very queerly, and had stipulated the hour when your letter was to be handed to me, and so felt that something was wrong. When I read it, I hurried after you. Oh, how could you think for a moment to take what God alone has the right to take from you, your life?" She shuddered.

Then with a gentle caress, she went on:

"Don't think I am censuring you, dear, for I know what an ordeal you have passed through, and what is before you, but let me, in my love, uphold you through it all. I promised you, here in this spot, that I would ever love you, that naught but death could part us. Here on the day of our engagement I as solemnly vowed to myself, as on our wedding day I shall openly declare, to love and stand by you whatever the future would bring. I love you, Van, I love you more than any riches you could bring me. In a moment of this kind, how one realizes that naught but love is worth while in this world."

She put her arms about his neck, and pressed her lips to his breast. The sweetness of her presence drove away that black bride, death, whom he had so dangerously courted.

The cloud was passing from his brain, and as in a dream between sleeping and awakening, he beheld her, the woman whom he loved, but of whom he had feared to ask a worldly sacrifice.

"I was mad, dear," he said slowly, hesitatingly, "I didn't know what I was doing. Beset with the one dreadful thought, it fed itself upon me, until hypnotized. I felt I must perform its dictates. But you have broken the dreadful spell, you and the little fallen sparrow. It was Christ's Sermon on the Mount, over again."

"It is His Day," the girl said solemnly, "it is Easter Sunday, the day of His Resurrection. It is a resurrection for you, too, for the old discouraged self has died, the new self has risen to live! I care only for you and your love. We will face the future together, you and I. You are innocent, disgrace is not yours. I do not care what the world will say. My happiness lies only with you. All I have—it is yours, yours to use and to prove that my faith is well founded."

Again she slipped her arm about his body, seeming thus to infuse new life, new spirit, into the big frame that once knew no discouragement nor fear.

And he felt how generously she gave, and his heart stirred within him, and as he looked into the brilliant eyes turned to his, and saw only her deep love and sympathy for the dreadful ordeal through which he had passed, a strong determination formed in his mind, a determination to make good. He had slipped, slipped dangerously, but now he would show himself the man he always had been, and would glory in the tremendous task of again "making good."

He drew her into his arms.

"Dare I say it?" he murmured, "will God forgive the sin, if sin it is? For you—I say it reverently—you are my redeemer. Not a sparrow shall fall without its father. Nearly two thousand years ago were the words spoken, and they held good today. Had not the sparrow——"

She gently put her fingers to his lips, and kept back the dreadful supposition.

"Let us go now," she said gently. She held up his long coat which he slipped on and buttoned up to his neck. She picked up his collar and tie, and held them tenderly, and Van as he noted this, saw the tenderness of heart a woman exhibits toward the inanimate things of the man she loves. He felt she already had a wife's claim upon him.

He slipped his arm about her.

"Lucille, dearest," he said softly, "I cannot leave you out of my sight for a moment. Can it be today, dear?"

She knew what he asked.

"Not today, Van," she smiled. "We'll need a license. But," and her voice was sweetly consoling, "it can be tomorrow."

In the glowing sun, over the new grass in which the tiny wind-flowers blew, they slowly made their way down the Mount.

Farmer's Wife Gets Fancy Prices for Produce in Attractive Containers

A STORY of how a farmer's wife proved the value of color in selling fruits, vegetables and flowers. It was just before the thirtieth of May. Two years ago the idea came to her and she carried it out sending a wagon loaded with baskets of pansies, English daisies, forget-me-nots and late tulips, into the market on Decoration Day. The baskets had all been colored. A big boiler of dye was mixed with the desired color, after which it was carried into the shed, where the baskets were dipped into the dye with a stick. They were then put out in the sun to dry.

She purchased baskets with wire handles as she had noticed they sold more readily and were easy to carry. They were colored in dull blues, soft greens, and golden browns. The plants were then picked out carefully,—for a dull blue basket was chosen, the dainty, blue forget-me-not, and the pink English daisy formed a border. A golden brown basket was filled with different shades of yellow tulips, while the green baskets had the faces of the soft, velvety pansies in the purple shades, some so light as to be almost gray, while others were nearly black; in this way she gave each basket individual thought.

She sent twenty dozen to the market, looking after them as they were placed in the great farm wagon, seeing that the colors were correctly placed, for the appearance of the wagon must be given as much thought by her, she realized, if she would sell her merchandise, as the merchant gave to his store window.

Her husband had decided to drive the team into the city, stopping at the foot of the common. It was not long before the customers began to gather around the space about the wagon with its bright burden of flowers. The crowd reminded one of bargain day in a department store, here and there were seen on the street colored baskets in the hands of all classes of men and women, some of them being carried to decorate the graves of the loved ones, or to brighten the homes of the sick,—old and young alike seemed pleased, and to appreciate them.

When there were only a few baskets remaining, a florist rushed up to the farmer asking him how many baskets he had left. He purchased them all, asking how many more he could bring that afternoon. The farmer replied that he was sorry, but the scheme had worked out beyond their expectation and they had sold all the baskets they had colored, so that he would be unable to give the florist any more that day,—however he took a large order for later in the week.

Starting from this the wife of the farmer has built up quite an unusual business, thinking up attractive and odd ways of sending things to the market, for instance, she colored a few strawberry baskets, a delft blue, filling them with the clean, fresh leaves of the fruit. She then picked out large, firm, red berries, with about an inch and a half of the stem left on each one, filling the boxes with these. These brought fancy prices in the market and numerous telephone orders (as they are served at lunches for the first course, on bed of powdered sugar, the guest eating them from the stem). Other baskets were colored by her and sent to the market, with fruits of different variety,—for instance, a basket colored a light violet, filled with luscious bunches of purple grapes, with a few of the leaves, was very attractive.

The better class of market-men were enthusiastic over her idea. She is near a small city of twenty-five thousand inhabitants, and as one of the market-men remarked, "if she could send them into a large city, giving them the same attention, she would not be able to meet the demand for her work," but she is quite content, however, for last year she cleared between eight and nine hundred dollars and this year is expecting more.

She is now planning Christmas baskets, filled in the same way with cranberries, apples and popcorn, coloring the baskets and arranging them with the fruits, and in among them will be greens gathered from the woods. She says she realizes, as never before, the value of color in everything when it is harmonious. Undoubtedly there are many opportunities of adding artistic touches along these lines that the average farmer does not have time to consider, but may be these suggestions will prove of interest, even if they are not considered practical by all. This is the experience that one farmer's wife has had on a sixty-five acre farm, situated in the heart of Essex County, in Massachusetts.

Nerine's Second Choice

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Lispenard, cousin to Kit Belton's mother, marries a Canadian girl. Dying he leaves a widow, two girls, Agatha and Nerine, and one son Maurice. Mrs. Lispenard marries Clarence Mayne, an interloper. At her decease she leaves Clarence Mayne an income until the girls are of age. Lispenard house and money go to the male heir in the direct line. Clarence Mayne goes on a trip to Monte Carlo, Kit Belton comes on a visit, while Maurice Lispenard, denied the education which is his by right, walks from Liverpool, where he is learning to be a mechanical engineer, to be with Kit Belton. Jones, known to Maurice as Lister, is ordered to harness the horses, when they go to see Lord Satterlee in a game of football. Agatha recognizes him. He has attended St. Jude's that he might see her. Maurice invites Lord Satterlee to dine with him. A young maid, not familiar with the house, and suspicious, leaves him in the darkness. He gropes his way to Clarence Mayne's room, where Nerine finds him later. She picks up a fallen table. In a secret drawer she discovers a book with her mother's initials on it. Nerine and Agatha going for a walk meet Lord Satterlee who hopes to see them at the next dance. Returning to Mr. Mayne's rooms the next day Nerine discovers that they are occupied during his absence and detects a strange woman putting the Lispenard silver in a strong bag. Left alone Nerine substitutes stones and minerals and covers them with her silk skirt. The woman returns, there is a struggle and Nerine falls senseless.

CHAPTER X.

LADY SATTERLEE.

MR. JONES that wet evening had sauntered down to a public-house just opposite the railroad station, which was a favorite resort of his. He stood in the doorway out of the rain idly watching the passersby and wishing that a friend of his with whom he had an appointmest would be promptly on time.

Several people went by on their way to the station, little noticed by Mr. Jones, who took no interest in the traveling public. Suddenly a stout lady, carrying a large bag, came into view out of the streaming fog and passed, with a half mind to stop and enter the public-house, which made her pause just long enough to be recognized.

Mr. Jones was little and weazened and quick on his feet. He was down the street after the stout woman, and had clutched her before she had reached the brilliant electric lights of the station.

As she turned, startled and ready to scream, he addressed her.

"Shut up, now, Mary! Don't make no noise. I've caught you pretty well, my girl: Who was going home the first thing Tuesday morning? And where have you been ever since?"

"What's that to you?" said the woman. She had been drinking and her fingers had only an unsteady grip on the large bag she carried. It slipped out of her uneasy grasp and dropped with a thud on the pavement.

"What's this?" the man inquired, suspiciously. He picked it up in spite of her effort to be too quick for him, and its weight astounded him.

"You've been up at Mayne's," he swore, angrily. "Why did you write me that pack of lies about your going home at once? And what have you here?"

He looked at the bag. It was one of Mr. Mayne's, with his monogram in silver on its blue flap.

"It's mine!" the stout but untidy female returned, sharply making a quick grab at it, but uselessly.

"I think not."

Jones fumbled with the fastening and undid it.

"Why didn't you get a key while you were about it?" with a contemptuous glance. "And what's all this?" He ran his hand into the opening. Holding the bag cautiously, he withdrew into an alleyway and rummaged rapidly, while the woman fought quietly to wrench it away from him.

"Now be quiet, Mary," he ordered. "What the devil's this!" pulling out a stone, then another, and an end of purple silk. He stared wonderingly at them.

With an angry cry she snatched the articles and plunged her hands into the bag, furiously searching it.

"It's that girl!" She stamped her feet. "Curse her! She's got it—and I've been breaking my arm carrying a pack of rubbish!" She began to cry. "I hope she's dead," she exclaimed. "Why did I ever leave that window open on her?"

Jones shut the bag.

"You'd better just tell me all about it, or I'll walk you back to my stable and shut you up there till Mayne comes home." And he clutched her flabby arm with a grip she could not shake off for all her stout build and her anger. "Go on, now!" He shook her viciously, glancing round the dark alley to see that he was unobserved. "Look sharp."

"There's no need to hold me," sullenly. "I'd just as soon tell you. I've been fooled, and it don't matter now how much you know."

She leaned against the brick wall beside him and poured out her story. When she concluded he gave a low whistle.

"I almost wish you'd got off with the stuff; I owe that young whelp something. It would have melted into a good penny, too. But now that you've been caught there'll be a fine old row. Young Lispenard will tell the police, and things will look bad for me!"

He paused and reflected.

"Where'd you get the chloroform?" he sharply demanded.

"Off Mr. Mayne's washstand," she whimpered. "I knew he always had it for his asthma."

"Why did you want to go messing round with the silver?"

"So that he'd be blamed. I tell you I'm sick of him. I wish he was dead!"

"It wouldn't do you any good," Jones returned, quietly, "and all you've done is to make the place too hot for me. We'd better get away home and let Mayne know of your—nonsense. He won't want any police coming round after me—nor after you, either."

He picked up the bag and started for the station, hurrying his companion and swearing at her till she stopped crying and made her best pace beside him. He asked one more angry question as they hurried through the foggy street.

"Did you give the girl enough to do for her?"

"No; only just what Mr. Mayne used to take when the asthma kept him awake."

"I'm blessed if I know what to do," he muttered. "There's bound to be trouble, no matter how you take it!"

Arriving at the station he bought a ticket, hesitated, thought a second; then he pushed his companion into a second-class carriage and turned, bag in hand.

"I'm going to the telegraph office," was his only remark, but he was still there when the train went out of the station.

Mr. Jones was not astonished at being confronted by Jane on his return to his quarters over the coach-house with a message that Mr. Lispenard wanted him, but he was quite knocked out when throughout the long and stormy interview Miss Lispenard sat in the room, though apparently taking no part in the interrogatory.

"I know him better than you, Maurice," Agatha had said. "I shall know if he is lying or not when you could never tell." And she sat, placidly knitting, till Maurice, unsatisfied and angry, told the man to go.

Jones knew nothing about the bag or the inhabitant of Mr. Mayne's rooms. He had lost the latchkey of the side door. Yes, he might have dropped it in a public-house. He had been the worse for liquor one night; he might have taken it out of his pocket mixed up with loose coins and never seen it. But he would take his oath he had known nothing about the theft until he was told.

"Well," said Maurice, when the door had closed on the man, "what do you think of him?"

"I think that he really does not know anything about it. He may know who did it (did you see how he kept wiping his upper lip?) but I don't really think he had a hand in it."

Maurice lighted a pipe and smoked, silent and frowning.

"I tell you, Agatha," he said at last. "I've half a mind not to do anything about the thing. If we have Jones arrested on suspicion that means an end to our holiday at once! Mayne would come tearing back. And yet I don't at all like sitting by and having the devil's tricks played with my sister under my very nose."

The last thing Agatha wanted was to see Clarence Mayne return. Why, she did not even say to herself.

"If we could manage without a fuss it would be nicer," she returned, candidly. "But it is awful to think that some one may be walking about our house all the time and we not know it."

"Whoever it was, he is gone now, and I'll make it pretty hard for him to get back again! I tell you, Agatha, what I'll do. You can write to Mr. Mayne if you like," in answer to her look. "I don't care whether he knows or not, and I'll watch Jones. If I find out anything fishy we'll just run our friend in! Just now we've only suspicion to go on. The only trouble is that I may have to go back to work at any moment, and I can't leave you girls alone to go through any more chloroform business."

"There won't be any!" Agatha said, confidently. "Maurice, you don't think Mr. Mayne could have anything to do with that affair, do you?"

Maurice shook his head.

"Not from what Nerine says. And, besides, Mr. Mayne has absorbed all our income for years. A little silver more or less wouldn't be worth his while."

Are you going to sleep in Mr. Mayne's room?"

"Not I. I don't care what goes on in there. But I'm going to have a sofa across the door from our part while I'm here. Then I'll be pretty sure that no one gets in without my knowing. I say, Agatha, don't you let Jane know there's anything wrong. We don't want her talking about it. You see, we're rather in a hole about Jones. We can't dismiss him; he's Mayne's servant. If we told him to go he wouldn't. We can either accuse and prosecute him or do as I propose and keep dark. And I think that's the best way, on the whole."

"I can't write to Mr. Mayne," said Agatha. "I haven't his address—anything more, at least, than an idea of it—and I'm certainly not going to ask Jones." She rose, yawning, and stretched both her long arms over her head. "I'll tell the girls what you think and then we won't worry any more. Mr. Mayne may find out in time. I really can't tell him." And the usually conscientious Agatha, with pinker cheeks than was usual with her, left the room.

A couple of days passed without any event whatever. Satterlee's cake was put away in the cupboard to await his next visit, and the Lispenards walked and drove at their own sweet will, a slightly depressed Jones doing their bidding with a meekness which made them pretty certain that the stout lady of the bag had not been unknown to him, whether her object was or not. Mr. Mayne's henchman was not too comfortable, in truth, as to what that gentleman would do on his return, and it affected his appetite and his manners.

Into the calm atmosphere came a note to Maurice one morning which made Agatha color as she read it. She threw it across the table for public inspection.

Lady Satterlee was at the Highbury Hotel, and hoped that Maurice would bring his sisters to see her that afternoon.

"What do you suppose brought her?" she said, curiously.

"She's always going about the country with her maid and four dogs," Maurice returned, irreverently. "We'll go, of course. She's a very fine lady, indeed."

He left the room whistling, quite unconscious that the minds of the three young women had performed precisely the same leap into the futurity and jumped back again to the same conclusion.

That very afternoon the twins and Maurice—Kit having elected to stay at home—were ushered into Lady Satterlee's sitting-room in the Highbury Hotel. With an odd sensation, Nerine knew she had never been in a room like it before; that the old-fashioned interiors of the country houses to which she had paid state visits had never had one breath of the atmosphere lent to this ordinary hotel room by the mere passing visit of a woman of fashion.

An agreeable pinkish mist seemed to reign in the room, shed by two very pretty lamps. There were flowers and palms and a curious, delicate odor besides which was as balm to the girl's nostrils. At one side of the fire was a screen which looked all gold to dazzled eyes fresh from the dark wintry evening; in front of it was a tea table, and between the gold of one and the outspread silver of the other sat a woman who rose as they advanced.

Lady Satterlee greeted Maurice with effusion, the girls with moderation; he was that need of every-day life—a "nice boy;" they were the tolerated beings called "girls". Lady Satterlee was too modern to wish to cultivate girls.

As she got down into her comfortable chair again, interrupting her son's greeting to tell him to order some tea, Nerine had a clear impression of Lord Satterlee's mother.

Mother! She looked like his sister. Her artificial paleness, her terra-cotta hair, her exquisite eyes, her intricate and remarkable tea gown of apricot velvet, sable, and old lace, all stood out against the gold embroideries hung over the screen behind her like an old Italian picture.

"Where are the dogs, Lady Satterlee?" Maurice inquired as he handed around the teacups.

Lady Satterlee laughed, showing the whitest of lovely teeth. "Poor things! I left them. They are getting bored with traveling."

She had not stirred hand or foot to serve the tea, but as she took her cup from Maurice she nodded kindly and naturally at him. "I hear you've been entertaining Bobby. Awfully good of you; but your stepfather is away, he tells me, and I dare say you enjoyed it. I will come and dine with you myself when he is gone for good."

She had not taken the faintest apparent notice of the girls. Now she looked at them with calm and unveiled interest. "You are ridiculouslv alike and most—oh! most terrifically different," she said, taking in their beauty, their plain dress, their air, with one comprehensive look. "I should never mistake you."

Satterlee looked wonderingly at her.

"I don't see the difference," he said. "I did not know Miss Nerine from her sister at all at first."

"Your dear father, Bobby, was also extremely unobservant." She laughed at her son's glance at Agatha. So she was the attraction, and she had not half the character of her sister.

"I dare say, Miss Lispenard, that you have already discovered Bobby's density and the simplicity of his methods," she remarked. But it was Nerine's eye which understood hers and not Agatha's, though the latter answered.

"Now, about this dance," she continued, holding her cup in a hand whose magnificent rings glittered in the lamplight, to Nerine's fascination. "It illustrates Bobby's delightful simplicity so well," and she laughed kindly at her son.

"You might at least say 'his' dance; it doesn't sound so brutally indifferent," Satterlee interrupted.

"Well, his dance, then," affably. "I had not said three words to him before he launched out upon it. You know, Bobby, that you did not conceal for one second that my very opportune arrival was the reason of your great joy at seeing me."

"Well, one reason," Bobby assented, stretching his long legs well out in front of him as he took a vacant chair beside Nerine. "But I think it was you who congratulated me on providing at least an attempt at amusement for you."

Agatha looked at Lady Satterlee. Somehow, it had never occurred to her that a woman with a grown-up son could look forward to a dance from personal reasons, but then, it had not occurred to her either that at forty-four it was possible to look (in a dim light) like thirty.

Lady Satterlee read the girl's grave simplicity with one quick look of her big eyes.

"Miss Lispenard is thinking I should know better at my age," she said. "The fact is, I have not been to a dance given in barracks for an appalling period," she observed, giving her teacups to Maurice to refill. "Tell me, what sort of room do they propose we shall dance in? Once, in the dark ages, I ruined my very best frock dancing at a ball given by young persons like Bobby."

Agatha colored.

"But I don't know anything about the room, you know. We—Nerine and I—have never been inside the barracks in our lives."

"What? And you live in a garrison town!" They were refreshing, these girls, after the girls to whom she was accustomed.

"We don't go out much with Mr. Mayne," Maurice observed, dryly. 'We can't live up to his tone socially."

"But you do go out sometimes to teas, small dances?" said Lady Satterlee, interrogating Agatha, who only shook her head.

"We're not asked," said Nerine, truthfully. "I mean, as a rule, you know; and when we are, we won't go."

"But you will surely go with me to Bobby's party?"

Nerine sat upright in her chair.

"Do you really mean it?" she asked candidly, looking with bright eyes straight at this woman, who seemed to live in another world. "Shall we not be a nuisance?"

"To me"—gravely—"or to Bobby?"

Nerine colored.

"I meant to you," rather confusedly.

Lady Satterlee laughed. Her big eyes met Nerine's kindly, naturally.

"My dear girls," she said, "I shall be delighted to take you."

"It is very good of you to be troubled with us," Nerine said, gravely, "but it is not quite certain that we can go—that I can go, at least," making a feeble struggle.

Maurice frowned at her.

"Oh, you can go. We can all go," he declared, hastily, "unless Mr. Mayne comes back and forbids the banns."

Lady Satterlee broke out into a ripple of laughter.

"I wonder," she said, softly, and to no one in particular, "if I could not manage even Mr. Mayne?"

CHAPTER XI.

AT THE BALL.

"Where is Nerine?" inquired Miss Belton, appearing in the morning-room just at lunch time the next day, to find Agatha alone there, gazing rather morosely at the fire, over her darning basket.

"I've not seen her since breakfast, or Maurice either," her cousin returned, listlessly. "Lunch is ready; we won't wait for them."

Breakfast had been a stormy meal; one endless discussion, indeed, had raged ever since dinner the night before, and raged fruitlessly, storming the same ground over and over again without result. "The dance—they must go," from Nerine. "Of course they were going," loudly, from Maurice. "How could they go?" desperately, from Agatha. All this went on during the despondent silence on the part of Kit Belton, who sat miserable and self conscious because she could not give them frocks.

The Masked Bridal

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

She flushed with painful embarrassment, however, when a servant came in to wait upon them.

Edith was scarcely seated beside her when Emil Correlli made his appearance.

"See!-I kneel-I beg-I implore!"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Edith Allandale, the only support of an invalid mother pawns a valuable watch. To redeem it she offers a five-dollar gold piece, paid to her by Royal Bryant, to the broker, who, dropping it into the drawer declares it a counterfeit and returns it. Going home her mother suggests it may be genuine and again Edith goes out to buy food and coal. While eating supper an officer enters, followed by the grocer who insists upon Edith's arrest for passing counterfeit money. She is hurried to the station house, leaving her mother in the care of Kate O'Brien. Edith writes to Royal Bryant explaining the situation. He redeems the watch, secures Edith's release and sends her home, where she finds her mother dying. After her death in reading letters, Edith learns she is an adopted daughter, the child of a dear friend, who believes she is legally a wife, until the father of her child admits his perfidy and deserts her. Edith writes Mr. Bryant, giving no address and goes to Boston, securing a position as companion with Mrs. Gerald Goddard. Edith discovers there is a skeleton in the family, when Mrs. Goddard accuses her of attempting to steal her husband's affections. Emil Correlli, Mrs. Goddard's brother is persistent in his attentions to Edith; she tries to avoid him and decides to leave. Mrs. Goddard begs her to stay. Edith, going to walk renders assistance to Mrs. Stewart, who is attracted to her and shows agitation when she learns she is a companion to Mrs. Goddard, and if she needs a friend to come to her. Edith is overtaken by Emil Correlli. Nearing Mrs. Goddard's house, a woman, unknown to Edith addresses Emil in a foreign tongue. Realizing that Edith thinks there is something mysterious in his relation to this woman he endeavors to set it right, renews his protestations of love, offers marriage and is staggered by her refusal. Mrs. Goddard unfolds a scheme which cannot fail to make Edith Allen his wife, but Emil must go away. Mrs. Goddard plans with Edith for a "mid-winter frolic," at their country home. The housekeeper, Mrs. Weld, overhears Mr. Goddard entreating his wife for a certain document. Mrs. Goddard proposes a theatrical performance entitled "The Masked Bridal." The guests arrive. Mrs. Weld takes a folded paper from Mrs. Goddard's jewel case; it vindicates her. Mrs. Goddard, having sent for Edith and seeing Mrs. Weld in an adjoining room devises a scheme to get her from meeting Edith to whom she explains that Miss Kerby and brother who have the leading parts, have been summoned home and requests Edith to supply Miss Kerby's place. Edith objects to what appears sacrilege. Over persuaded she consents and veiled and masked the ceremony is performed. When she hears Mrs. Goddard congratulate Emil she grasps the duplicity and nearly falls senseless. Mrs. Goddard, returning to the ballroom asks Emil to introduce his friend, Mrs. Stewart. Meeting her, Mrs. Goddard calls her husband, who recognizes in Mrs. Stewart his former wife.

CHAPTER XVIII.

"I SHALL NEVER FORGIVE EITHER OF YOU FOR YOUR SIN AGAINST ME."

THE morning following the great Goddard ball at Wyoming, found Edith much better, greatly to the surprise of every one.

At Emil Correlli's request, the physician had remained in the house all night, in case he should be wanted; and when he visited her quite early in the morning, he expressed himself very much gratified to find her so comfortable, and said she would do well enough without any further medical treatment, but advised her to keep quiet for a day or two.

This Edith appeared perfectly willing to do, and lay contentedly among her pillows, watching her kind nurse while she put the room in order, making no remarks, asking no questions, but with a look of grave resolve growing in her eyes and about her sweet mouth, which betrayed that she was doing a good deal of thinking upon some subject.

Mrs. Goddard came to her door immediately after breakfast, but Edith refused to see her.

She had told Mrs. Weld not to admit anyone; therefore, when the lady of the house sought admittance, the housekeeper firmly but respectfully denied her entrance.

"But I have something very important to say to Edith," madam persisted.

"Then it had best be left unsaid until the poor girl is stronger," Mrs. Weld replied, without moving her portly proportions and holding the door firmly.

"I have a message from my brother for her—it is necessary that I should deliver it," Mrs. Goddard obstinately returned. Mrs. Weld looked back into the room inquiringly.

"I do not wish to see any one," Edith weakly responded, but in a voice of decision which told the listener outside that the girl had no intention of yielding the point.

"Very well; then I wait until she feels stronger," said the baffled woman, whereupon she left.

Mrs. Weld spent as much time as possible with her, but she of course had her duties below to attend to; so, at Edith's request, she locked her in and took the key with her when she was obliged to go down-stairs.

Left alone, Edith fell into deep thought.

In spite of a feeling of despair which, at times, surged over her in view of the trying position in which she found herself, the base deception practised upon her, aroused a spirit of indomitable resistance, to battle for herself and her outraged feelings, and outwit, if possible, these enemies of her peace.

"They have done this wicked thing—that woman and her brother,'" she said to herself; "they have cunningly plotted to lure me into this trap; but, though they have succeeded in fettering me for life, that is all the satisfaction that they will ever reap from their scheme. They cannot compel me, against my will, to live with a man whom I abhor. Even though I stood up before that mutitude last evening, and appeared a willing actor in that disgraceful and sacrilegious scene, no one can make me abide by it, and I shall denounce and defy them both; the world shall at least ring with scorn for their deed, even though I cannot free myself by proving a charge of fraud against them. But, oh——"

The proud little head suddenly drooped, and with a moan of pain she covered her convulsed face with her hands, as her thoughts flew to a certain room in New York, where she had spent one happy, blissful week in learning to love, with all her soul, the man whom she had served.

She had believed, as we know, that her love for Royal Bryant was hopeless—at least she had told herself so, and that she could never link her fate with his, after learning of her shameful origin.

Yet, now that there appeared to have arisen an even greater barrier, she began to realize that a hope had not been quite dead—that, in her heart she had all the time been nursing a tender shoot of affection, and a faint belief that her lover would never relinquish his desire to win her.

But these sad thoughts finally set her mind running in another channel, and brought a gleam of hope to her.

"He is a true and honorable man," she mused. "I will appeal to him in my trouble; and if any one can find a loophole of escape for me I am sure he will be able to do so."

When Mrs. Weld brought her lunch, she sat up and ate it eagerly, resolved to get back her strength as soon as possible in order to carry out her project at an early date.

"If you feel able to talk about it now, I wish you would tell me exactly how they managed to hoodwink you to such an extent. Perhaps I may be of some service to you, when the matter comes to a crisis," the woman remarked, as she studied the sweet face before her with kind and pitying eyes.

And Edith related just how Mrs. Goddard had drawn her into the net by representing that two of her actors had been called away in the midst of the play and that the whole representation would be spoiled unless she would consent to help her out.

"It was very cleverly done," said Mrs. Weld, when she concluded; but she looked grave, for she saw that the entire affair had been so adroitly managed, it would be very difficult to prove that Edith had not been in the secret and a willing actor in the drama. "But do not worry, child; you may depend upon me to do my utmost to help you in every possible way."

The next morning Edith was able to be up and dressed, and she began to pack her trunk, preparatory to going away. The guests had all left on the previous day, and everything was being put in order for the house to be closed for the remainder of the winter, while it was stated that the family would return to the city on the next day, which would be Thursday.

Edith had almost everything ready for removal by noon, and, after lunch was over, sent word to Mrs. Goddard that she would like an interview with her.

The woman came immediately, and Edith marveled to see how pale and worn she looked—how she had appeared to age during the last day or two.

"I am so glad that you have decided to see me, Edith," she remarked, in a fondly confidential tone, as she drew a chair to the girl's side and sat down. "My brother is nearly distracted with grief and remorse over what has happened, and the attitude which you have assumed toward him. He adores you—he will be your slave if you only take the right way to win him. Surely, you will forgive him for the deception which his great affection led him to practise upon you," she concluded.

"No," said Edith, with quiet decision, "I shall never forgive either of you for your sin against me—it is beyond pardon."

"Ah! I will not intercede for myself—but think how Emil loves you," pleaded her companion.

"You should have said, 'think how he loves himself,' madam," Edith rejoined, "for nothing but the rankest selfishness could ever have led a person to commit an act of such duplicity and sacrilege as that which he and you adopted to secure your own ends. He does not desire to be pardoned. His only desire is that I should relent and yield to him which I never shall do."

As she uttered these last words, she emphasized them with a decided little gesture of her left hand that betrayed a relentless purpose.

"Ah!" she cried, the next moment, with a start, the movement having attracted her eye to the ring upon her third finger, which until that moment she had entirely forgotten.

With a shiver of repulsion, she snatched it off and tossed it into the lap of her companion.

"Take it back to him," she said. "I had forgotten I had it on; I despise myself for having worn it even until now."

"You are very hard—you are very obdurate," madam said, sharply.

"Very well; you can put whatever construction you choose upon the stand I have taken, but do not for a moment deceive yourself by imagining that I will ever consent to be known as Emil Correlli's wife; death would be preferable!" Edith calmly responded.

"Most girls would only be too eager and proud to assume the position—they would be sincerely grateful for the luxuries and pleasure they would enjoy as my brother's wife," Mrs. Goddard coldly remarked.

A little smile of contempt curled the corners of Edith's mouth; but otherwise she did not deign to notice these boasting comments.

"Edith, I beg that you will listen to me," madam earnestly pleaded, after a few moments of thought. "This thing is done and cannot be undone, and now I want you to be reasonable and think of the advantages which, as Emil's wife, you may enjoy. You are a poor girl, without home or friends, and obliged to work for your living. There is an escape from all this if you will be tractable; you can have a beautiful house elegantly furnished, horses, carriages, diamonds, and velvets—in fact, not a wish you choose to express ungratified. You may travel the world over, if you desire, with no other object in view than to enjoy yourself. On the other hand, if you refuse, there will be no end of scandal—you will ruin the reputation of our whole family—Emil will become the butt of everybody's scorn and ridicule. I shall never be able to show my face again in society, either in Boston or New York; and my husband, who has always occupied a high position, will be terribly humiliated."

"You should have thought of all this, madam, before you plotted for the ruin of my life; I am not responsible for the consequences of your treachery and crime."

"Crime! that is an ugly word," cried Mrs. Goddard.

"Nevertheless, it is the correct term to apply to what you have done—it is what I shall charge you with——"

"What! do you dare to tell me that you intend to appeal to the courts?" exclaimed madam, aghast.

She had fondly imagined that, the deed once done, the girl having no friends whose protection she could claim, would make the best of it, and gracefully yield to the situation.

"That is what I intend to do.

"And you utterly refuse to listen to reason?" Anna Goddard inquired, struggling hard for self-control.

"I utterly refuse to be known as Emil Correlli's wife, if that is what you mean by 'reason,'" said Edith, calmly.

"Girl! girl! take care—do not try my patience too far," cried her companion, with a flash of passion, "or we may have to resort to desperate measures with you."

"Such as what, if you please?" inquired Edith.

"That remains to be seen; but I warn you that you are bringing only wrath upon your own head. We shall never allow you to create a scandal—we shall find a way to compel you to do as we wish."

"That you can never do! It is my nature," she went on, after a slight pause, "to be gentle and yielding in all things reasonable, and when I am kindly treated; but injustice and treachery, such as you have been guilty of, always arouses within me a spirit which a thousand like you and your brother could never bend nor break."

"Do not be too sure, my pretty young Tartar."

"I rejected Monsieur Correlli's proposals to me some weeks ago," Edith resumed. "I made him clearly understand, and you also, that I could never marry him. You appeared to accept the situation only to scheme for my ruin; but, even though you have tricked me into compromising myself in the presence of many witnesses, it was only a trick, and therefore no legal marriage. At least I do not regard myself as morally bound; and, as I have said before, I shall appeal to the courts to annul whatever tie there may be supposed to exist. This is my irrevocable decision—nothing can change it—nothing will ever swerve me a hair's breadth from it. Go tell your brother, and then let me alone—I will never renew the subject with either of you."

And as Edith ceased she turned her resolute face to the window, and Anna Goddard knew that she had meant every word that she had uttered.

"Do you imagine you can defy us thus?" madam cried, laying an almost brutal grip upon the girl's arm, as she arose to abandon, for the time, her apparently fruitless task. "No, indeed! You will find to your cost that you have stronger wills than your own to cope with."

With these hot words, Anna Goddard swept angrily from the room, leaving her victim alone.

CHAPTER XIX.

"I WILL NEVER BREAK BREAD WITH YOU, AT ANY TABLE."

As the door closed after the angry and baffled woman, the portly form of the housekeeper entered the room from an apartment adjoining, where, as had been previously arranged between Edith and herself, she had been stationed to overhear the whole of the foregoing conversation.

"What can I do?" sighed the young girl.

"Nothing just yet, dear, but to try and get well and strong as soon as possible," responded Mrs. Weld.

"Did you hear how she threatened me?"

"Yes, but her threats were only so many idle words—they cannot harm you; you need not fear them."

"But I do; somehow, I am impressed that they are plotting even greater wrongs against me," sighed Edith.

"They will not dare——" began Mrs. Weld, with some excitement. Then, suddenly checking herself, she added soothingly: "But do not worry any more about it now, child—you never need 'cross a bridge until you come to it.' Lie down and rest a while; it will do you good, and maybe you will catch a little nap, while I go down to see that everything is moving smoothly in the dining-room and kitchen."

Edith was only too willing to heed this sensible advice, and, shortly after the housekeeper's departure, fell into a restful sleep.

She did not awake until it was nearly dark, when, feeling much refreshed, she arose and dressed herself, resolving that she would not trouble tired Mrs. Weld to bring up her dinner, but go down-stairs and have it with her, as usual.

The house was very quiet, for, all the guests having gone, there was only the family and the servants in the house.

Edith remained in her room until she heard the dinner-bell ring, when she went to the door to listen for Mr. and Mrs. Goddard and Emil Correlli to go down, before she ventured forth, for she had a special object in view.

Presently she heard them enter the dining-room, whereupon she stole softly down after them and slipped into the library in search of the daily papers.

She found one, the Transcript, and then hurried back to her room, lighted the gas, and sat down to read.

Immediately a low cry of dismay burst from her, for the first thing that caught her eye were some conspicuous head-lines announcing:

"A STARTLING SURPRISE IN HIGH LIFE."

These were followed by a vivid description of the festivities at the Goddard mansion in Wyoming, on the previous evening, mentioning the "unique and original drama," which had wound up with "the great surprise" in the form of a "bona fide marriage between the brother of the beautiful and accomplished hostess, Mrs. Goddard, and a lovely girl to whom the gentleman had long been attached, and whom he had taken this opportunity and very novel way of introducing to his friends and society in general."

Then there followed a resume of the play, giving the names of the various actors, an account of the fine scenery and brilliant costumes, etc.

The appearance of the masked bride and groom was then enlarged upon, an accurate description of the bride's elegant dress given, and a most flattering mention made of her beauty and grace, together with the perfect dignity and repose of manner with which she bore her introduction to the many friends of her husband during the reception that followed immediately after the ceremony.

No mention was made of her having fainted afterward, and the article concluded with a flattering tribute to the host and hostess for the success of their "Winter Frolic," which ended so delightfully in the brilliant and long-to-be remembered ball.

Edith's face was full of pain and indignation after reading this sensational account.

She was sure that the affair had been written up by either madam or her brother, for the express purpose of bringing her more conspicuously before the public and with the intention of fastening more securely the chain that bound her to the villain who had so wronged her.

Oh, it is a plot worthy to be placed on record with the intrigues of the Court of France during the reign of Louis the Thirteenth and Richelieu!" Edith exclaimed. "But in this instance they have mistaken the character of their victim," she continued, throwing back her proud little head with an air of defiance, "for I will never yield to them; I will never acknowledge, by word or act, the tie which they claim binds me to him, and I will leave no effort untried to break it. Heavens! what a daring, what an atrocious wrong it was!" she exclaimed, with a shudder of repugnance; "and I am afraid that, aside from my own statements, I cannot bring one single fact to prove a charge of fraud against either of them."

She fell into a painful reverie, mechanically folding the paper as she sat rocking slowly back and forth trying to think of some way of escape from her unhappy situation.

But, at last, knowing that it was about time for Mrs. Weld to have her dinner, she arose to go down to join her.

As she did so the paper slipped from her hands to the floor.

She stooped to pick it up when an item headed, in large letters "Personal" caught her eye.

Neither Kit nor Agatha had the heart to speak of the dance now; both in truth were glad to avoid the subject, and they ate their chops and mashed potatoes in a naturally grateful silence.

Suddenly the door swung open, and Nerine burst in, her eyes shining, her cheeks rose-pink from the sharp air. She bore an enormous package, which she placed tenderly on a chair, and behind her was Maurice, also wearing a calm smile of triumph, and also carrying a package.

"I went, I saw, I conquered!" cried Nerine, eying the surprised girls, who were staring at her across the half-emptied plates.

"How did you go?" said Agatha, stupidly; "and what on earth is in that parcel?"

"I went in the T-cart—driven by Mr. Lispenard, of Lispenard House"—with a smirk of mock respect at Maurice; "and if you ask where I went, it was to Stevens, the draper's. Here"—cutting the cords of her parcels—"are the spoils!"

Spoils indeed! Yards and yards of creamy, softest satin, white flannel to line it, filmy silky chiffon to cover the bodice and sleeves.

Agatha jumped up and looked with mingled anguish and pleasure at the simple materials, the like of which she had never owned in all her twenty years.

"Who—who paid for them?" she asked, faintly.

Maurice and Nerine exchanged expressive glances; then Maurice rose to the occasion.

"We charged them!" he said, magnificently. "They were delighted to have our custom."

"They really seemed to be," echoed Nerine, rather thoughtfully.

Agatha looked from one to the other.

"How much were the things?" she said sharply. "Tell me, Nerine! And who did you see in the shop? Was it Stevens himself?"

"Agatha's always so serious minded," Maurice remarked. "What does it matter of whom she bought them so long as we've got them? If it had not been for genius on my part, you'd never had 'em!"

Agatha stamped her foot; her placid eyes were blazing.

"Nerine, tell me all about it," she said. "I do not see how you could have been so mad as to go into debt for such things. If Mr. Mayne ever gets the bill, he will be so furious that he will probably put an advertisement in the papers warning people not to give us any credit!"

Nerine laughed with a comforting consciousness of merit.

"You old silly Agatha! Do you suppose I did not manage better than that? In the first place I had Maurice drive me—I thought it would look better than walking—then I went straight to Stevens himself and told him that Mr. Mayne was away and we were going to a dance with Lady Satterlee, and wanted gowns. I said we could not pay him till next year, and he said the money did not matter. Indeed, he waived the question as though it were one I shouldn't have mentioned."

Agatha looked relieved. Mr. Stevens was a kindly old man, who had sat next them in church when they were children and forced to attend every morning in the distasteful company of their stepfather. Many a sugar candy, flavored with peppermint and striped with strange colors, had he secretly handed into their pew to lighten the dullness of the sermon.

"We'll pay him long before a year," she said with determination.

"Oh, ages before!" Kit said, glancing at Maurice, and holding up the shimmering, pearly satin in seductive folds.

"I mean," hastily, "that I can lend you more money by and by."

"Stevens can wait," Nerine observed, as she made inroads on the lunch. "He expects to—thanks to my diplomacy."

Agatha sank limply down on the sofa.

"I don't see how you dared do it!" she exclaimed. Then her eyes kindled as they rested on the satin. "What a heavenly frock I can make out of that!" she said, devoutly, and Nerine laughed between two mouthfuls.

"Nothing to what I can make. I told you I meant to go to that dance, and I shall—in much glory and fine raiment."

And she gave Agatha that lovely liquid glance so full of mirth and sweet mockery, which had shown at once to Lady Satterlee the difference between the two girls.

That lady, piloted by her son, came to tea late that afternoon, and, with some languid interest as to whether her charges would be presentable or not, broached the subject of frocks. They need not wear anything fine. She herself would wear an old thing just fit to finish out at Bobby's ball.

"We will wear all we have," Nerine said, laughing, and that was all the information their chaperon received, for which she rather admired them.

The dressmaking operations were carried on in secret up in Kit's room, and never a thread or a clipping told the tale to Satterlee or his mother.

They were happy days which came before the dance—wildly happy to Nerine; she forgot in them the strangeness of the woman in Mr. Mayne's room; even the book she had safely hidden away. She grew lovelier each day; Lady Satterlee noted that keenly, and saw, too, what a revelation herself and her society were to the girl. Nerine fairly drank in the daintiness, the sweet scents, the luxury which surrounded the first woman of fashion she had ever known, and in return, Lady Satterlee liked her. Agatha was all very well if Bobby fancied her, but she had not the makings of a fine lady like Nerine, nor the air, nor the insolence, nor any of the possibilities of her sister. Lady Satterlee mused on the subject. Bobby was as much with one as with the other, as far as she could see, and if he were in earnest, he might as well take the pick of the bunch. Of course it would be a nuisance to have him married, but he had no need to marry money, and he was terribly susceptible, poor, dear Bobby! So perhaps it was best to let him do exactly as he wished. And then the dower house was really very charming—far more to her taste than Satterlee itself. She was quite resigned to the prospect of a Lispenard daughter-in-law, being in truth accustomed to treat Bobby's will as law, but she sincerely hoped it might be Nerine.

She much astonished her son by taking an active interest in the arrangements for the dance. She insisted on visiting the series of barrack-rooms which had been cleared out by Lord Satterlee and the three brother officers giving the dance, and she shed great sweetness and life on those toiling heroes.

She made several suggestions, which, of course, were adopted, and at last, with a mind at ease as to her comfort during the evening, she submitted to be driven back to her hotel and her dinner.

The Lispenards and Miss Belton were to dine with her at the hotel; afterward they would all drive over to the barracks together. Lady Satterlee smiled at herself as she looked in the glass and saw her maid fastening her diamond necklace. What a lot of trouble, too, she was taking for her Bobby!

Well seasoned as she was, she felt a strange thrill when her guests arrived. Agatha first, all in white, tall and straight, and perfectly arrayed from head to foot, every line of her distinguished; Kit in pale lilac over turquoise, with a turquoise velvet belt; and behind them—Nerine.

A new Nerine, whose black head was carried gloriously, whose cheeks were carnation-colored, whose gray eyes glowed softly under their black lashes like purple lights of love. What had come to the girl that she outshone them all? What had given that lovely curl to her sweet mouth, that clear elation to her eyes? Her arms, too, and her throat; it was hard to say where they and her white satin gown divided. The elder woman, looking at the girl in all the beauty of her twenty years, felt again that quick shudder. Just so, she remembered, had she been flushed and excited, just so had she gone to that prehistoric ball given "by young persons like Bobby."

"Bobby will meet us at the door," she said, as they all settled themselves in the carriage to start, Maurice on the box. "And then we shall have nothing to do but enjoy ourselves after I have shaken hands with two hundred people whom I don't know."

Agatha kicked Nerine softly.

"We won't know them, either," she said, forebodingly. "What on earth"—under her breath—"shall we do if we have no partners?"

But even Agatha's spirits went up as they got out after innumerable waits and jerks, at a door all covered with flags, and hurried through a narow passage lined with more flags, to the cloak-room, for they were early; they were the guests of honor, and Lord Satterlee stood outside, banging at the half-open door and beseeching his mother to hurry.

They got out at last, and into the ballroom. Nerine had a confused impression of an expanse of glittering floor, of flags caught up with trophies of bayonets round the walls, of a crowd of men in uniform, all of whom were introduced to her, and all put down their unintelligible names opposite a dance on her program.

Then some women arrrived, then more men: in a few moments the room was full, was packed,

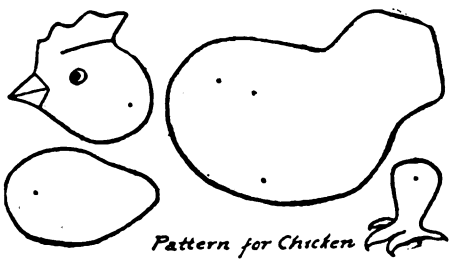
Easter Chicks That You Can Make

By Rosalie DeWolfe

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

AN Easter present that hasn't a chicken connected with it in some way or other is a very strange sort of Easter remembrance. The thousands of little yellow chicks all over the land are bringing Easter messages to thousands of boys and girls. Some are real live chickens that come to delight the little folks who live in the country; others are just little painted chicks that walk over the gay colored cards in the shop windows and down the covers of the picture books. Wouldn't you like to know how to make some cute little chicks yourself to send to your friends at the Easter season?

An Easter Chick that can Move Its Wings



An Easter chick that can move its wings, its head and feet is not a complicated mechanical toy at all. Just a plain little made-by-hand pasteboard chicken that can do all these things if one only knows how to make it. Such a toy is a charming Easter gift for any little boy or girl who likes to see things go.

All the material you need for making him are some old pasteboard boxes, white if possible, some of the little metal fasteners such as are often used to keep papers together, your color box and a pair of sharp scissors.

Here is the pattern for this cunning toy. You see it is in four parts, head, body, wing and leg. Lay tissue paper on these figures and trace them off to be used as your own patterns. By using the pattern just as it stands, you will have a wee chick. You can enlarge it to any size you choose, remembering only that real chickens are never very large. When you have traced the outline, cut out around the edges and lay the pieces on your cardboard. Then mark around these edges. You will need to lay the pattern of the wing and the leg on twice. Cut out all the pieces and paint them a pretty, delicate yellow. Be careful that the edges are all covered with paint, so that chicky will not look unfinished. Prick little holes in the different parts at the points indicated in the diagram. Now it is time to make the body, wings, head and legs into one complete chick. Insert the little fasteners in the holes, securing them on the back but not too tightly. Put an additional fastener through the lower part of the body. To the backs of each fastener stick a bit of string; then bring all the strings together around the additional fastener at the base of the body. By pulling a string attached to all the combined strings, chicky will move his wings and his head very nicely.

An Easter Card from an Egg-Shell

This Easter card makes a pretty remembrance for Aunty, or some grown-up, although a little girl, too, would be pleased with one to hang above her desk. To make it, you will need half of an egg-shell. One that has been broken for cooking will answer so there is no waste. Find some good, white cardboard, a few little feathers and some water colors. You may object that you can't get any feathers. If you don't live in the country, and own a chicken yard where the hens are always scattering their feathers or there isn't an old feather duster that is past usefulness, your chicken will have to get along without. Some of you may say you can't draw or paint, but you won't call this, drawing, it is so easy.

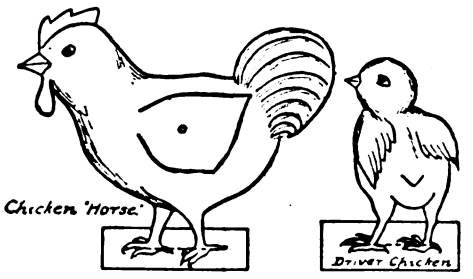
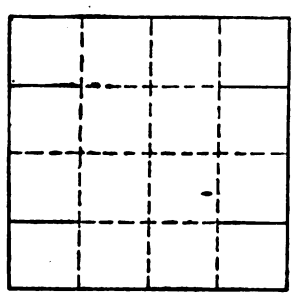
The foundation for the card is a piece of pasteboard five inches long by four wide. Cut the edges irregularly. Instead of using this foundation at first, it is a good plan to experiment with another piece of paper the same size. True the edge of the half egg-shell very carefully with very sharp scissors lest you crack it completely. This is to make the body of the little chick. Set it down on the practise sheet about in the middle. A head must be provided for this body. Above the egg-shell body, a little to the left, draw very lightly with your pencil, a one inch square. This is to be a help in drawing chicky's head so it should not be more than half an inch distant from the body. Inside the square make a circle which will touch the square at four points! Erase the faintly pencilled square and add a pointed beak at the left hand side and a dot of an eye inside. Now the chicken has a head. All that is necessary is to connect it with the egg-shell body by means of a neck. Two lines will make the neck. Sketch this on the practise paper. It will be easy to draw it on the good paper, after you have the idea. Two little feet are not difficult to add for they are just two pairs of straight parallel lines with four pointed toes at the end. Next paste the egg-shell securely in position on the square of paper you intend to use for your card and add the head, neck, bill, eye and two feet. Color the whole chick a delicate yellow with your water colors. But this poor chick is still wingless and tailless. It is for these that the feathers are needed. Give them a few touches of yellow paint and gum a tuft of feathers where the tail should be and a few more wings. If it is impossible to get feathers, draw a pointed tail and paint in the wings. Paint or print in pretty letters this little Easter message:

I've made this little chick to say,
I wish you joy on Easter day.

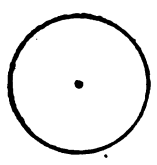


Add a loop of ribbon at the top by which this Easter egg chicken can be hung up.

Another Egg-Shell Chicken



Another chick, one that will really stand on his feet, can be made from an egg-shell in much the same way as the Easter card chicken. For this you will need the whole shell instead of half. The valuable part of the egg need not be wasted. Prick a little hole in each end of the egg and blow its contents into a cup. Every bit of the yolk and white will come out in this way leaving the shell light and empty. Color the shell yellow with your water colors. Use the sketch of a head that you made before, in practising, as a model for this chicken's head. Writing paper rather thin will do for the head. There should be two thicknesses pasted together except at the bottom of the neck. Here two little flaps are left to turn back and fasten to the egg-shell. The chicken's head should be painted and his eye marked before it is attached to the body. His legs are two strips of paper pasted together with the flaps left open at top and bottom, at the top paste to the egg-shell, at the bottom to fasten to a little square cardboard standard. The legs should be stiff enough to support the egg-shell body. Wings and a tail are added in the same way as before. This little chick makes a dainty little favor for an Easter luncheon or an appropriate little gift for almost any one.



A Wagonful of Easter Chicks

This little wagon with its load of Easter chicks will serve both as a toy for a little friend or a favor for an older person. The body of the wagon is made from a piece of drawing paper six and a half inches square. Light colored Manila wrapping paper will do very nicely. Fold the square in halves so that it becomes an oblong. Then fold it over in halves again, making it into a smaller square. Fold this smaller square in halves as before and again until what is left is a tiny square. Now open it all out and you will see that the paper is creased in sixteen small squares. Cut along one side of each corner square in such a way that if you kept on cutting along these same sides the outside strips would be cut off entirely. Do not cut them off, but bend up the four outside strips and paste the corners over so that a little box is the result. For wheels use pasteboard circles, two inches in diameter or paper disks that may be bought of the milkman. The thills are just strips of cardboard five and a half inches long and half an inch wide. Attach the thills and the two wheels through the same hole in corresponding sides of the cart by a small brass paper fastener. The big chicken that draws this little cart is traced from the chicken pattern and cut from rather stiff cardboard. Bend back that standard and fasten the thills to his sides with a paper fastener. You will see that the two-wheeled cart will balance nicely. The little passenger chicks are cut out in the same way from cardboard and painted yellow. Paste them inside the cart facing forward of course. Give your wagon a gay coat of paint or decorate it in any way that seems pretty to you. Festoons made of pale blue tissue paper fringed on the edges and fastened here and there around the sides of the cart make a very dainty trimming. From the hill of a little driver-chick in front end of the cart, stretch blue tissue paper reins to the horse-chick's head. Slip under his wing a little whip made of a toothpick wound with blue paper and ending in a little fringed tassel under. Two passenger chicks on opposite sides of the cart carry a paper banner raised on two toothpicks. The banner reads:

A Wagonful of Easter Happiness.

Just try some of these cute chicks and see what dainty Easter remembrances they make.

Without imagining that it could have any special interest for her, she glanced in an aimless way over it.

Suddenly every nerve was electrified.

"What is this?" she exclaimed, and read the paragraph again.

The following was the import of it:

"If Miss Allendale, who disappeared so suddenly from New York, on the 13th of last December, will call upon or send her address to Bryant & Co., Attorneys, No. — Broadway, she will learn of something greatly to her advantage in a financial way."

"How very strange! What can it mean?" murmured the astonished girl, the rich color mounting to her brow as she realized that Royal Bryant must have inserted this "personal" in the paper in the hope that it would meet her eye.

"Who in the world is there to feel interested in me or my financial condition?" she continued.

At first it occurred to her that Mr. Bryant might have taken this way to ascertain where she was from personal motives; but she soon discarded this thought, telling herself that he would never be guilty of practising deception in any way to gain his ends. If he had simply desired her address he would have asked for that alone without the promise of any pecuniary reward.

She stood thinking the matter over for several moments.

At last her face cleared and a look of resolution flashed into her eyes.

"I will do it!" she murmured, "I will go back at once to New York—I will ascertain what this advertisement means then I will tell him all that has happened to me here, and ask him if there is any way by which I can be released from this dreadful situation, into which I have been trapped. I am sure he will help me, if any one can."

A faint, tender smile wreathed her lips as she mused thus, and recalled her last interview with Royal Bryant; his fond, eager words when he told her of her complete vindication at the conclusion of her trial in New York—of his tender look and hand-clasp when he bade her good by at the door of the carriage that bore her home to her mother.

She began to think that she had perhaps not used him quite fairly in running away and hiding herself thus from him who had been so true a friend to her; and yet if she remained in his employ, and he had asked her to be his wife, she knew that she must either have refused him, without giving him a sufficient reason, or else confessed to him her shameful origin.

"It would have been better, perhaps, if I had never come away," she sighed, "still it is too late now to regret it, and all I can do is to comply with the request of this 'personal.' I would leave this very night, only there are some things at the other house that I must take with me. But tomorrow night I will go, and I shall have to steal away, or they will find some way to prevent my going. I will not even tell dear Mrs. Weld, although she has been so kind to me; but I will write and explain it all to her after my arrival in New York."

Having settled this important matter in her mind, Edith went quietly down-stairs, and returned the paper to the library, after which she repaired to the tiny room where she and Mrs. Weld were in the habit of taking their meals.

The kind-hearted woman chided her for coming down two flights of stairs, while she was still so weak; but Edith assured her that she really began to feel quite like herself again, and could not think of allowing her to wait upon her when she was so weary from her own numerous duties.

They had a pleasant chat over their meal, the young girl appearing far more cheerful than one would have naturally expected under existing circumstances. She flushed with painful embarrassment, however, when a servant came in to wait upon them, and gave her a stare of undisguised astonishment, which plainly told her that he thought her place was in the dining-room with the family.

She understood by it that all the servants knew what had occurred the previous night, and believed her to be the wife of Emil Correlli.

But nothing else occurred to mar the meal, and when it was finished Edith started to go up to her room again.

She went up the back way, hoping thus to avoid meeting any member of the family.

She reached the landing upon the second floor and was about to mount another flight when there came a swift step over the front stairs, and before she could escape, Emil Correlli came into view.

Another instant and he was by her side.

"Edith!" he exclaimed, astonished to see her there, "where have you been?"

"Down to my dinner," she quietly replied.

"Down to your dinner?" he repeated. "If you were able to leave your room at all, your place was in the dining-room, with the family, and," he added, sternly, "I do not wish any gossip among the servants regarding my—wife."

"You will please spare me all allusion to that mockery," she bitterly, but haughtily, retorted.

"It was no mockery—it was a bona fide marriage," he returned. "You are my lawful wife, and I wish you, henceforth, to occupy your proper position as such."

"I am not your wife. I shall never acknowledge, by word or act, any such relationship toward you."

"Oh, yes you will."

"Never!"

"But you have already done so, and there are hundreds of people who can prove it," he answered, hotly.

"It will be a comparatively easy matter to make public a true statement of the case," said the girl.

"You will not dare set idle tongues gossiping by repudiating our union!" exclaimed the young man, fiercely.

"I should dare anything that would set me free from you," was the dauntless response.

"You would find very few who would believe your statements," he said; "for, besides the fact that hundreds witnessed the ceremony last night, the papers have published full accounts of the affair, and the whole city now knows about it."

"I know it—I have read the papers," said Edith.

"What! already?"

"Yes."

"Well, what did you think of the account?"

"That it was simply another clever piece of duplicity on your part, the only object of which was the accomplishment of your nefarious purposes. I believe you yourself were the author of it."

Emil Correlli started as if he had been stung. He did not dream that she would attribute the article to him—the last thing he could wish would be that she should think it had emanated from his pen.

Nevertheless, his admiration for her was increased tenfold by her shrewdness in discerning the truth.

"You judge me harshly," he said, bitterly.

"I have no reason for judging you otherwise," Edith coldly remarked; then added, haughtily: "Allow me to pass, sir, if you please."

"I do not please. Oh, Edith, pray be reasonable; come into Anna's boudoir, and let us talk this matter over amicably and calmly," he pleaded.

"No, sir; I shall discuss nothing with you, either now or at any other time. If," she added, a fiery gleam in her beautiful eyes, "it is ever discussed in my presence it will be before a judge and jury!"

"Yes, Anna told me you threatened that; but I hoped it was only an idle menace," he said. "Do you really mean that you intend to file an application to have the marriage annulled?"

"Most assuredly—at least, if, indeed, after laying the matter before the proper authorities, such a formality is deemed necessary," said the girl.

April is the last month of COMFORT'S Grand Subscription Prize Contest. This is your last chance to win the prizes. You may win two big prizes this month if you enter now. You have as good a chance as anybody to win an April monthly prize and you may win a Grand Prize, too, besides premiums or cash commissions that pay you big for a little effort. Start today.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

THE letter below from "COMFORT Reader" and several similar requests, which are not printed, prompt me to give the readers a page from one of Uncle Sam's many valuable books, and the sisters are asked to supplement this by giving their own personal ideas along the lines suggested.—Ed.

Outfit for the Baby

It is very apt to be the case, especially with a first baby, that the mother wastes a good deal of vital energy in the preparation of an elaborate layette, only to find that many of the garments are outgrown before they are worn. On this account it is much more economical, not only of materials but of the mother's strength, to make only a few very simple garments at first. Later, when the baby is older, such a wardrobe as the mother desires may be added, but for a little baby plain garments of the softest materials procurable are the most suitable.

Large dealers now supply the entire outfit for an infant, and in many cases it is an economy to buy one of these layettes complete.

In preparing for the newborn several principles should be kept in mind. The first is that the garments must be warm without being unduly heavy; another, that they must be loose enough to provide for perfect freedom of the muscles; the third is the desirability of perfect simplicity; and the fourth that of cleanliness. Adornment serves no other purpose than to gratify the mother's taste.

The Baby's Clothes

The following list includes all the garments that it is necessary for any young infant to have for the first few weeks of life; later, if a more elaborate outfit is desired, other garments may be added:

Three abdominal bands, six by eight inches wide and twenty inches long, soft flannel strips, unhemmed. Three shirts, size two, wool and cotton, or wool and silk, not all wool. Four flannel skirts. "Gertrude" style. Three nightgowns or wrappers of outing flannel, buttoned in front. Eight white slips. Three knit bands, with shoulder straps, part wool. At least four dozen diapers. Cloak. Cap. Carriage blanket of crocheted or knitte wool. Three pairs of socks, if in summer; three pairs of long white merino stockings, if the weather is cold.

Nursery Equipment

The essential articles for the baby's nursery are a comfortable bed and the things that will be needed in his toilet. The following list will be found to include the essential items:

An old soft blanket. Four dozen safety pins of different sizes. Some old soft towels. Soft wash cloths. Hot-water bag, with flannel cover. Talcum powder. Castile soap. Olive oil. Two ounces of boric acid.

A crib. If desired, a clothes basket makes a good bed. A basket or box that may readily be moved about is a great convenience. The mattress for any sort of a bed may be made from table felting, which, when folded a few times, makes a very soft, smooth bed and has the great advantage over the ordinary mattress that it may be washed and boiled and dried in the sun.

Additional Conveniences

Below is a list of additional articles that will be found convenient in the care of the baby:

Bathtub, tin, galvanized-iron ware or rubber. Drying frames for shirts and stockings. Bath apron of Turkish toweling or outing flannel. A low chair, without arms. Baby scales. A low screen, to protect the baby while it is being bathed. A low table on which to bathe and dress the baby. U. S. Dept. of Labor.

DETROIT, MICH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a subscriber of COMFORT for some time and am much interested in all parts of the paper.

I wonder if I might ask you or some of the sisters to put in the paper an outfit for a new born baby, which is to be born about the middle of the summer; also how to make the clothes and what kind of goods to use.

I am not very good at dressmaking but know I could do some sewing if I had the instructions.

I would be very much obliged to you if you will do this for me, and perhaps many others would like to see the same thing in print.

COMFORT READER.

MOSINEE, WIS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Just move over a little, please, and let another schoolma'am enter your happy circle. How many teachers are here? Not very many I think. I always look for the teachers' letters first, when I'm reading COMFORT Sisters' Corner. I don't find many of them though I like to read the descriptions of the many sisters, so I'm going to give you a slight idea how I look. I'm very tall and have blue eyes, dark hair, fair complexion, and wear glasses. I've been a teacher for eight years and have seen the bright and the dark sides of teaching. What troubles me most in my schoolwork is teaching geography. I always found that to be a difficult subject to teach.

What I want, is to have the teachers in the different states help me a little in this matter by letting their pupils correspond with mine. If any of the teachers would write to me I'd send them the names and addresses of some of my upper form pupils.

I think this would help make geography real to them.

With the use of Royal Baking Powder, fewer eggs are required and in some recipes, may be omitted altogether.

Just add a small quantity of Royal, about a teaspoon, in place of each egg omitted and you will obtain excellent results and effect great economy. The following recipes are practical illustrations:

A new and economical way to make a fine sponge cake

SPONGE CAKE

1 cup sugar
½ cup water
2 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
½ teaspoon salt
1 teaspoon flavoring
3 eggs
1 cup flour
⅛ cup cold water

The old method called for 6 eggs and no baking powder

DIRECTIONS:—Boil sugar and water until syrup spins a thread and add to the stiffly beaten whites of eggs, beating until the mixture is cold. Sift together three times, the flour, salt and baking powder; beat yolks of eggs until thick. Add a little at a time, flour mixture and egg yolks, alternately to white of egg mixture, stirring after each addition. Add ⅛ cup cold water and flavoring; mix lightly and bake in moderate oven about one hour.

Eggs are not necessary to make these excellent muffins

EGGLESS MUFFINS

2 cups flour
1 cup milk
4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
2 tablespoons sugar
½ teaspoon salt
2 tablespoons shortening

Makes 18 muffins

The old method for plain muffins called for 2 eggs

DIRECTIONS:—Mix and sift dry ingredients, add milk and melted shortening and beat until smooth. Bake in greased muffin tins in hot oven 20 to 25 minutes.

A delicious, inexpensive dessert easily made at home

JELLY ROLL

1 cup sugar
1 egg
3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
6 tablespoons hot water
1½ cups flour

The old method called for 3 eggs

DIRECTIONS:—Mix and sift dry ingredients; stir in well-beaten egg; add hot water; beat well until smooth; pour into large well-greased pan. Batter should be not more than ¼ inch thick for cakes to roll nicely. Bake in slow oven. Turn out on sheet of brown paper, well dusted with powdered sugar. Beat jelly with fork and spread on cake. With sharp knife trim off all crusty edges and roll up while still warm by lifting one side of the paper. To keep the roll perfectly round, roll up in cloth until cool.

The Quality of Meats

IN order to become a good judge of meats it is very helpful to have a few lessons from an experienced buyer. The different cuts will thus be easily learned, but the quality of the meat depends on so many factors, as the age of the animal, the breed, and the method of fattening, that it is easy to make mistakes in choosing, and the buyer will often be wise in accepting information from the dealer, if he is one who prides himself on keeping first-class meats. Having found such a one, the customer who wishes to save time and money will continue to buy of him. The very large amount of meat which some housekeepers provide is not necessary. In general it is better to use a reasonable amount of that which is in prime condition rather than to economize on the quality. The meat is easily supplemented by other dishes, and the whole meal will thus be better balanced than would be the case if a larger amount of inferior meat were provided. Although not generally understood, it is just as important that the cheaper cuts of meat, as well as the dearer ones, should come from a well-fattened animal.—U. S. Dept. of Agriculture.

TOMATO BISQUE.—One pint of tomatoes, one pint of sweet milk, one level teaspoon of salt, a little pepper, one tablespoon of butter, one half teaspoon of soda, one half cup of bread or cracker crumbs. Stew the tomatoes one half hour, add soda, stir until the froth disappears, then strain. Add crumbs and seasoning. Just before serving stir in a pint of boiling milk.

SOUR MILK GRIDDLE-CAKES.—To one cup of flour add one teaspoon of sugar, half a teaspoon of salt and one cup of sour milk to which half a teaspoon of soda has been added and one well-beaten egg. Beat well together. Grease griddle with a piece of salt pork and drop in batter a spoonful at a time, and unless it sizzles as soon as it touches the griddle the iron is not hot enough. As soon as cake is full of bubbles it is ready to turn. Serve with syrup or butter and sugar.

SOUR MILK GRIDDLE-CAKES.

APRIL FOOL SHERBET.—Juice of four lemons, one quart of boiling water, one pint of sugar and the whites of two eggs. Scrape the yellow of one lemon rind into the boiling water, add sugar and let stand at boiling point till clear. Add lemon juice. When cold pack in freezer, three parts ice finely chopped to one part coarse salt. Let stand fifteen minutes, then turn freezer slowly, and when partly frozen add the whites of eggs beaten stiff and dry; then finish freezing.

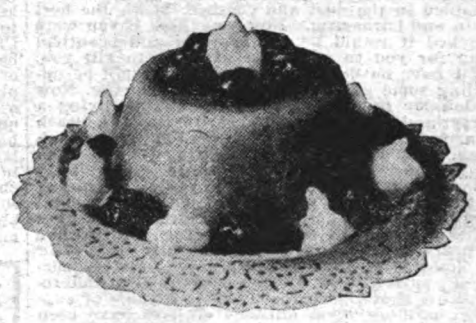
APRIL FOOL SHERBET.

To serve, heap a glass dish with the well frozen sherbet, place it in center of tray, and surround it with ice cream cones turned upside down and topped with a cherry. On each cone print the word "Dunce" and serve sherbet in cones. If cones cannot be obtained, make them of thin cardboard and line with two thicknesses of paraffin paper.

SMOTHERED ROUND OF BEEF.—Cook four slices of fat salt pork in frying pan till fat is extracted, then add one sliced onion and cook until light brown. Remove onion and in the flavored fat cook brown on both sides a two or two and a half pound slice of round of beef. Pour in enough boiling water to just cover the meat, add the onion, cover and let simmer till tender, then transfer the meat to a heated platter. Cook two tablespoons of flour in two tablespoons of water, add gradually one cup of strained beef liquor, season with pepper and salt, cook and stir till thick and pour around the meat.

DRIED BEEF AND CREAM.—Cut into small pieces enough dried beef to make one and one half cups. Have in readiness a pint of rich milk, one and one half tablespoons each of melted butter and flour, and one egg. Put the milk on the stove in a double boiler and when it reaches the boiling point, add the butter and flour which have been well blended, and stir until it forms a thick, smooth cream. Put the prepared beef into a strainer, pour through it a quart of hot, but not boiling, water, drain, stir it into the cream and let it heat thoroughly before serving. Stir the egg well into the mixture and add salt and pepper to taste. Serve with baked potatoes.

HOT ROAST HAM, CIDER SAUCE.—Soak ham in cold water, wash and put in kettle with one half cup each of onion and carrot, two sprigs parsley and four cloves. Cover with cold water, bring to boiling point and simmer until tender. After two hours add one quart cider. Allow ham to cool in liquor, remove, take off skin and bake one hour.



CIDER SAUCE.—Melt three tablespoons butter, add four tablespoons flour and two cups ham liquor. Bring to boiling point, add four tablespoons cider and a little pepper.

SCALLOPED SAUSAGE.—Arrange half-a-dozen slices of sausage in the bottom of a baking dish, pile on top mashed potato which has been well seasoned with salt, pepper and butter, and into which a cup of hot milk has been beaten; dot with bits of butter and bake half an hour in a hot oven.

BAKED SAUSAGE.—Arrange the rounds of sausage in a shallow baking dish, pour around them a little stewed and seasoned tomato and bake till brown.

FANNIE V. TIDD, New York, N. Y.

CHOCOLATE PUDDING.—Bring two cups of milk to a boil in double cooker. Slowly stir in four even tablespoons of corn-starch wet with one third cup of cold milk; add half a cup of sugar, pinch of salt, and three heaping tablespoons of grated chocolate melted with two tablespoons of sugar; cook twenty minutes, stirring frequently. When slightly cool, beat in one teaspoon of vanilla, and fold in the stiffly beaten whites of four eggs. Put into mould, and when ready to serve, turn out on plate and garnish with alternate mounds of whipped cream and cherries, and surround a mound of whipped cream with cherries on top.

LEAGUE RULES: To be a comfort to one's parents. To protect the weak and aged. To be kind to dumb animals. To love our country and protect its flag.

CONDUCTED BY UNCLE CHARLIE

COMFORT for one year and admittance to the League of Cousins for only 30 cents. Join at once. Everybody welcome.

NEVER send a subscription to Uncle Charlie, nor to the Secretary of the League.
NEVER write a subscription order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write the order on a separate sheet from the letter, and then both may be mailed together in the same envelope.
ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

HOP up onto my lap and snuggle down close. This is a critical period in the history of our country and of the world, and the letter and comments that follow should be studied by all of you with profound interest.

East Northfield, Mass.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have thought long and seriously on the subject of war and self defense and I have come to the conclusion that before I would take the life of any human being, I would die myself. As long as there is breath left in my body I shall stand to this decision. Is there any one who dares to say it is cowardly to die a martyr's death for righteousness sake?

Lovingly yours, COUSIN C.

The lady who wrote the above letter and requested that her name be withheld was once a student at Northfield Seminary, founded by the famous evangelist Dwight L. Moody. Cousin C., like so many of those who are afflicted with acute pacifism, has gone all astray on the subject on which she feels so deeply. But that is not her fault, as nearly all the other pacifists go off half cocked and always explode before they know what they are exploding about, and before they have thoroughly informed themselves on the subject which has aroused their too abundant emotions. Cousin C. is one of those peculiar people who if attacked would make no defense. She would allow the other fellow to kill her, but she would never kill the other fellow, and she and all other pacifists believe that that is the correct stand to take, the stand that would be most pleasing in the sight of God. Well if everybody thought as Cousin C. does everything would be perfectly lovely. We could cheerfully become non-resisters, for there would be no evil in the world and no enemies to resist. If no one was disposed to attack anyone else there would be no need for self defense. But for the love of Mike what are you going to do when you live in a world where a good half of the people, and that half the worst half, is always looking for a chance to wipe the other half, which is the good half, clean off the earth?

Now what would happen to us if we allowed rats and mice, roaches, bedbugs and all other forms of vermin to run riot all over our homes? You know what would happen. They would have possession of the home and we would be on the outside. If we did not fight the bugs and insects we'd have no crops. If we didn't fight cold we'd freeze to death. If we didn't fight fire we'd burn to death, and if the good people in the world don't resist the bad ones, the human vermin, the good people will soon be wiped out, and the criminal and degenerate, the vile, the murderers and the bloodthirsty will soon rule the world.

Now take a brief survey of the past and see what man has come up from. In the dawn of our race upon this planet, men and women lived in trees and caves and ran wild in the swamps and jungles, terrorized by the mighty beasts that roamed around them. In those days every man's hand was against his neighbor's. There was no marriage, no family life. Then man got interested in the babe a savage woman bore him. That made him interested in the mother, and the two of them found a common shelter and that was the first home. The woman stayed "home" while the man went out and killed wild animals for food, or slaughtered his neighbor and dragged him home to his cave and made a meal of him. Thus family life began. Children grew up and brought more children into the world, and the family became the clan. Instead of one man going out to kill the wild men and mammoth beasts that roamed the jungle, the family or clan went out, and in time the mastodon and the sabre tooth tiger and other of their species disappeared, and man turned from hunting to husbandry; the clan became the tribe, the tribe became the nation, and the first duty of a nation in those days as it is in these, is to protect its citizens and make life and property safe. A government that does not do this is no government at all, but is a farce, a humbug and a breeder of anarchy.

And now a common interest and a common danger has made nations go further, and today we find groups of nations, fighting other groups of nations. When this war ends we shall probably find the whole world divided into two camps, and we shall be forced into one camp or the other and our isolation and selfish aloofness will be a thing of the past. Now my dear Cousin C., I am confident you would fight rats and mice and would even shoot a mad dog if it attacked you and you had a gun in your hand. Self preservation is the first law of nature and life is as sweet to the pacifist as to anyone else. In this world there are the forces of darkness and the forces of light, the forces of evil and the forces of good. You are arrayed on the side of good. The forces of evil are things that cannot be argued with. They must be fought and crushed. If you do not do your part in crushing them, somebody must do it for you, or all that is holy, beautiful and godlike in this world will be trampled in the dust and crushed 'neath the heel of sin and barbarism. Now you think if you were attacked it would be an inspiring and beautiful thing for you to allow the attacker to kill you, and I have no doubt you think you would be upholding some glorious principle by so doing. Now pardon me my dear, you would not be dying a martyr's death, you would be dying the death of a worm, the death of a craven and a poltroon. You'd be utterly wasting every good thing that God had put into your body and by your ignoble death, you'd be aiding in the destruction of all that millions of real martyrs in the past, have sacrificed their lives for. You seem to forget that for you to live in peace and comfort and worship God after the dictates of your own conscience and to surround yourself with all the conveniences and refinements that this present age is capable of supplying millions upon millions of lives have been sacrificed, and rivers and oceans of blood have been shed. You are willing, selfishly willing, though you do not realize it, to take every advantage of all this terrific sacrifice, but you are not willing to do one single thing yourself to help in the perpetuation of those things which you enjoy and accept as a matter of course, things others have fought and died for so that we might benefit by them. Yes, you will say, I am willing, I am willing to go and preach love to the world. That I do not doubt, but there comes a time in the affairs of men and nations when the forces of evil will not listen to talk and when only physical resistance to evil counts. You I know devoutly believe in the Prince of Peace, the Christ. Now why did not Christ go and talk to the money changers in the temple? For good and sufficient reasons. He knew the time for talking had past and the time for doing had arrived. He did not hesitate to use force. You of course will say that force settles nothing, though it settled King George's rule on this continent and put an end to black slavery and drove Spain from Cuba. Evidently Christ thought that force was a necessary and righteous thing to use at times or he would not have resorted to it. He knew when to fight as well as when to talk, and He didn't hesitate to fight when the time came, and if you would uphold the precious things He taught and the precious principles He promulgated, you must be ready, not to waste your life, but to fight valiantly as a Christian soldier should against the armies of darkness.

I have no doubt that in the Northfield Seminary there is a copy of that beautiful old picture, the Puritan maiden going to the meeting-house on Sunday, with her Puritan lover by her side. And you will all please note that the young Puritan carries a gun over his shoulder. You know what that gun was for? It was to protect the maiden and himself from marauding Indians. Every New England farmer at one time had to have his rifle by his side when he worked in the fields. The Puritan maid and her lover were just as good Christians as you are Cousin C., and infinitely more level headed and practical. They were dealing with realities and facing facts, something people who hold your views, alas, will never do. If it had not been for that gun the Puritan carried over his shoulder there would be no semi-Christian civilization on this continent today. Northfield would not be sending forth its Christian missionaries. Instead the Redskin with his painted face, his blanket and his bow and arrow would be master of this, the fairest continent on the earth. Why is there any Christianity or sham Christianity on the face of the earth today, or any civilization either? Only my dear, because men have been willing to fight and die for ideals, beliefs and principles. When Rome grew soft and voluptuous, hordes of barbarians swept in from the north and overwhelmed her, and the Roman Empire crumbled and Europe was plunged back into centuries of darkness. It was for a time touch and go as to whether it should be Mahomet or Christ, occidental or oriental in Europe. Charles Martel in the eighth and John Sobieski in the seventeenth century rolled back the tide of Moslem invasion. If Henry Ford, Bryan, Professor Jordan and yourself, my dear Cousin C., and a lot of other cloud dwellers had been on the job, the Moslems would have overwhelmed Europe, the Christian maidens would have been huddled into harems and the Christian gentlemen would have been converted into slaves, eunuchs or fertilizer. Those two events are beacon lights of history. Write them down on the tablets of your memories. Here is another. The Greeks at Marathon and Salamis hurled back the tide of Persian invasion. If Ford and Bryan had been on the job, the Persians would have been allowed to have their way and we should have had no Aristotle, Plato, Thucydides, Aeschylus, Herodotus, etc., to have made literature glorious and to have laid the foundations of such civilization as is ours to enjoy today. In the thirteenth century Persia had developed quite a remarkable civilization. It had schools and universities, philosophers and literary men and quite a remarkable culture. These gentlemen however, like Ford and Bryan did not believe in armies. They spent a lot of money in the newspapers of their time, advertising as Ford has done, their preposterous notions of peace at any price and national impotence. About this time along came that terrible monster Genghis Khan with his ferocious hordes of Mongols, and down went Persian civilization in the dust. Russia at that time was struggling bravely up toward civilization. It had adopted Christianity, but did not believe in armies and was too proud to fight. As might be expected something happened, and the something in this case was our old friend Ghengis Khan and his blo ly swarms of human locusts These incarnate fiends swept Russia to the bone with fire and sword, and for two centuries the wretched people were crushed 'neath the heel of their vile and brutal conquerors and simply skinned alive. What the Russians endured in those two centuries beggars description. It would be a mighty good thing for some of the people in the United States if they could have just twenty-four minutes of that kind of misrule, torture, degradation and torment that Genghis Khan handed out to the wretched Russians for two hundred years. Nothing short of a little experience of that kind will ever bring a certain class of badly balanced, peace paranoiacs out of the clouds of their folly. The Armenians are naturally a peaceable folk, surrounded by a bloodthirsty, warlike people. They foolishly listened to the prattle of the pacifists, instead of the more far-seeing men among them who bade them arm for defense. You know the result. A million of them have been tortured and slaughtered horribly. Just now all China trembles every time a Jap turns over in bed. If we listened to Ford and Bryan and a lot of othed half baked dreamers we'd all be wearing pigtails and working twenty-five hours a day for a handful of rice, and we'd be lucky if our conquerors gave us the rice. If you Cousin C. had had your way, you would be living, not in the land of the free and the home of the brave, but in the land of degradation and the home of the slave. We would have no Lincoln and Washington in our history, and you'd see slave pens of black men grouped around the Bunker Hill monument.

You will tell me that Christ said "Resist not evil." That was to be a personal and not a national matter. In the 18th Chapter of St. John, 23rd verse, Christ said to the man who struck Him: "Why smitest thou Me?" He did not turn His other cheek to be smitten, on the contrary He started an argument, and most arguments lead to blows. If you saw a burglar stealing your property or a rat eating your bread, or dirt and neglect killing one of your children, if you wanted to sit back and resist not the evil but let it take its course, I suppose you'd be privileged to do it, but if that property the burglar was about to steal had been placed in your hands for safe keeping, or that bread had been given you to sustain another's life, or that child had been placed in your care to raise in health and strength, you would be in duty bound to resist the evil unto the death. Those into whose hands we have entrusted the life and honor of this nation, are in duty bound to protect these shores from invasion, to keep our coasts inviolate, and to see that no well meaning, but utterly misguided dreamers hand the whole bunch of us over on a platter to the first military nation that feels disposed to attack us. Isaiah warned the Jews that there was trouble brewing for them and they turned a deaf ear to his warnings and listened to the soft talk of the false prophets and pacifists of that time and what was the result? They got Babylon and they got bondage, and that's what any nation will get in a world that is full of ambitious, fanatical, sacrilegious rascals and villains called kings, emperors, czars and kaizers. When these hyenas and the devilish system of misgovernment they represent are swept from the face of the earth, we can scrap our arms and settle international differences with talk and soft words, reason and common sense, instead of guns.

I would not my dear Cousin C. quote the Scriptures at all if you were not a pious young lady. Both the British and the Boers are very devout people and great Bible readers, and during their little scrap they daily hurled Bible texts at each other to prove one was right and the the other fellow wrong. When the war ended they were still at it. When one fellow found a text that justified his actions, the other fellow could always find another text that would refute his opponents.

However here are just a few texts that you can ponder over: "The Lord is a man of war, the Lord of Hosts is His name." "Blessed be the Lord my strength, which teacheth my hands to war and my fingers to fight." Now for the New Testament: "Think not that I come to bring peace on earth. I came not to send peace, but a sword." "I am come to send fire on the earth." You will find that in the 12th chapter of Luke, and in the 22nd you will find this: "And he that hath no sword, let him sell his garment and buy one." And St. Paul said: "If thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for he beareth not the sword in vain; for he is a minister of God a revenger, to execute wrath on him that doeth evil." Dr. Lyman Abbott, than whom there is no better Christian or finer type of the real American living, writes as follows: "I am not therefore one of those who thinks that war is always wrong. I cannot think that Jesus Christ Himself inculcated the doctrine that force should never be used." Then he mentions that little instance of Christ's "militarism" in the temple, and continues as follows: "I am not afraid to follow Him, with whatsoever force it may be necessary for righteousness to put on, when uprighteousness has armed herself to commit wrong. I cannot think all war is wrong. If I did I should not want to look upon the Bunker Hill monument, for it would be monument to our shame; I should never want to speak the name of Gettysburg, for my lips would blister and my cheeks would blush; I should want to bury in a grave of oblivion the names of Washington and Grant."

Out of four hundred ministers of Christ in the city of New York who were asked to give their opinion on preparedness, three hundred and eighty were for all the preparedness we could get. Only twenty were non-resisters. In Europe by the way they put nonresisters in jail or in homes for the feeble minded. The proper place for them. It is foolish wasting one's time digging up Bible texts, and it is still more foolish to place a literal construction on these texts. The best way and the only fair way to do is to take Christ's teachings as a whole, and when we do that we can sum them all up in one word, and that word is righteousness, and righteousness must be upheld at all costs, for unless righteousness is upheld there can be nothing else in the world that can be worth while. "Seek ye first the Kingdom of righteousness and all else will be added unto you." In other words defend the right, fight the good fight, using every possible means in one's power to avert conflict, but never for one moment conceding one atom of any vital worth-while principle to wrong. That is the only way that a worth-while civilization can be established on this earth. As I have said before slaves can have peace, but only strong men can have justice and righteousness. It is up to you whether you want to become men or slaves.

Cousin C. here is a little story which will perhaps amuse you and others who think, or rather "emote" as you do. A Quaker was once held up by a thief. The thief knew the man was a Quaker and as the Quakers are non-resisters he thought he would have a cinch in robbing him. The thief swatted the Quaker on the right cheek, and the Quaker true to his beliefs promptly turned the left cheek to be smitten also. Having got both sides of his face smacked the Quaker addressed the thief thus: "My friend, I have permitted thee to slap both my cheeks, that's the Scripture, now I'm going to knock the stuffing out of thee, and that's the law," and the Quaker promptly proceeded to knock the stuffing out of the thief, with the result that an honest man was not robbed and a thief was thrashed and turned over to the law. Now Cousin C., take my advice and don't waste your life. If you are ever called to sacrifice that life, see that that sacrifice counts for righteousness instead of promoting wrong and dishonor.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her Ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Uncle Charlie just a word of thanks and appreciation for the books you recommended. Just finished reading the one on Woman Suffrage. Think it's the best I've read on the subject.

Wish more people were interested in reading. Ask someone if they have read a certan book and they tell you, "No, am going to see it played, won't bother to read it." No wonder minds become rusty when people would rather just look, than think.

It may interest you to know a friend of mine who has been in very poor health just wrote and said she couldn't express her thanks for your beneficial advice on indigestion in January COMFORT. She found almost instant relief from your remedies after several doctors failed to give her any help.

Thanking you for all the help and inspiration received from your writings,

I am sincerely yours, MISS EDNA STOCKINGER.

Edna, your letter tickles me all to bits. From it I learn I have helped one lady's mind and another lady's body and that is going some. It is only by results that our usefulness in this world can be measured. You have touched a very vital spot in modern day life in your comment on the disastrous influence of the movies on one-time book readers. Of course the intellectual will not be satisfied with just a look, but the people who only read to be entertained and who are interested solely in finding out whether Samantha Sauerkraut, the beautiful belle of Corn Cob Corners, Hick County, broke the heart of her rural lover, Hiram Boll Weevil, and eloped to New York with the son of the millionaire who boarded at the big summer hotel on the hill, and whether Samantha came home after being jilted by her wealthy lover and committed suicide on Hiram's grave, by cutting her throat with a fried tomato, or whether—or whether—well you know the rest. If you don't know the rest go to the movies, but don't look in a book; the book might start some of you thinking and that would be a terrible calamity. Anything that stops people from thinking is a calamity, and the movies are encroaching dangerously on the world of thought, otherwise the world of books. The nation that ceases to read will cease to think, and a nation that ceases to think will cease to live. Most of the present day movie pictures are mere mental anæsthetics. The eye goes on a drunk, while the brain goes to sleep. A man said to me the other day: "The movies are doing one good thing, they are helping to empty the saloon." "Yes," I replied, "and they are helping to empty people's brains." The saloon is bad enough heaven knows, but it has one advantage, you don't as a rule find it filled with women and children as you do the movies. About fifty per cent of the pictures you allow your children to see wouldn't be tolerated in European picture houses at any price. They have a drastic film censorship in Europe, and all the dirty, vile, hideous, lecherous, rotten side of life that our film makers dish up to drug the minds of film fiends and picture paranoiacs, are strictly tabooed. The trouble with every new invention, everything that might help, inspire, elevate and educate is, that it gets into the hands of an unscrupulous, vicious class of mad for profit hogs, who seek to exploit only the worst side of everything. They are familiar enough with the putrid side of human nature to know there is more ready cash in exploiting the salacious, the sensational and the obscene. In other words appealing to the lowest and most vicious instincts of the human animal, degrading instead of trying to uplift him, than in displaying the worth while, the artistic, the elevating and instructive. It is fine to think that in Kansas a generation is growing up that has never seen the saloon in operation and that knows nothing of alcohol and therefore has no craving for it; and it is simply hellish to think that we have here in our big cities and in cities that are not big, a generation growing up that knows next to nothing of books and has no desire to read. The mind is only too willing to get sluggish and lazy, just as the stomach is only too ready and willing to accommodate seductive and intoxicating drinks. The law says that no child under sixteen shall be allowed to enter a movie theater unless accompanied by friends or parents. This law of course like most American laws is

They can get ideas right from the different states in regard to climate, surface, industries, etc. If there is any way in which I can help in return I will gladly do so.

I have a small school this year, but for the four previous years I've had an enrollment of fifty or more. I found I was getting nervous and put the blame on the work in such an over crowded school, so this year I found a very peasant little school and enjoy it a great deal.

I'll answer all personal letters. Wishing COMFORT much success, I am, Very truly yours,

CLARA KENNEDY.

Miss Kennedy. Your request is a good one and I hope your pupils derive much help from the correspondence. Letter writing, even if confined to pupils in the different schools in the same town, awakens an interest that teaching, no matter how good, fails to bring forth. About the geography matter—maybe some other teacher will give you the benefit of her ideas.—Ed.

INDIANAPOLIS, 133 Downey Ave., IND.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Surely punishing a child for not saying its prayers will result only in harm! A great man has said, "A single grateful thought toward Heaven is the most complete prayer." How can grateful thoughts be instilled by punishment? Too often we observe the form of worship and neglect the spirit. Grateful thoughts may easily be aroused in a child, and yet the neglect is so common that many grow up to accept the blessings of life as a matter of course. Have the child watch the little birds at their loving patient toil of nest-building and caring for their little ones; help him care for a small garden, watch the unfoldment of the plants, rejoice over the rain and the sunshine; let him plant a tree so he will realize the long patient growth before fruit appears; examine with him pieces of coal, and show him how light and heat of wood of ages ago are stored up in the coal which now warms him; study with him all the works of nature, leading him to appreciate the time and patient, tireless, ceaseless effort needed to produce everything that he uses—and in due time his grateful thoughts toward Heaven cannot be repressed, for they will come from a heart full of gratitude to the Giver of all good!

To me, ingratitude is irreligion. In this connection I wish to speak of the Uncle Charlie Home Fund, for which I am enclosing four subscriptions to COMFORT. Sisters, are you satisfied with the progress of this work? We have long expressed in words our appreciation of Uncle Charlie—let us express it in a substantial way now that Mr. Gannett generously gives us the change. We must not fail in this plan for our faithful friend. It would be a disgrace to COMFORT'S six million readers—sisters, cousins, and all—if this great chance to help Uncle Charlie should pass by, unheeded! I heard of a sister whose neighbors and near relatives took COMFORT for years, but never mentioned it to her. It may be that your neighbors and relatives have never heard of COMFORT and Uncle Charlie. Get busy, then. Tell them before the day is over, and get their subscription for COMFORT and the Home Fund. And here is a fine chance to impress gratitude upon the minds of the young—they should help in this work for the friend who established the Cousins' League for them. Recently a young girl told me that she had read Uncle Charlie's Stories (a borrowed book), and had laughed till she cried over some of them, and that she had received more help in the use of English from Uncle Charlie's department than from all her teachers—but she was not lifting a finger for the Home Fund! Let us not delay or "let George do it." I am doing all I can, and am stirring up my friends and neighbors to enthusiastic work for this worthy cause. If all of us do the same, we will soon have a wave of enthusiasm that will sweep our whole COMFORT family—and we'll get that Home for our beloved Uncle Charlie.

With best wishes to all, CORDELIA HARRIS.

HONEA PATH, S. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have read COMFORT ever since I was a small girl, and I am now twenty-eight years old, but have never before written to the Sisters' Corner. My education is very limited; my futher died when I was fourteen years old and my schooldays came to an abrupt end.

Mrs. Aldridge's letter made me want to give my experience in regard to teaching a child its prayers.

Some years ago, six I think, I read a very touching letter in COMFORT from a heart-broken sister, whose name I do not remember, in which she gave the prayers she taught her boy—one I clearly remember:

"Four corners to my bed,
Six angels guard my bed.
Two to watch,
Two to pray,
Two to bear my soul away."

The child to whom she taught this prayer died, and when the little life was going out he repeated the last line, "Two to bear my soul away."

This letter made a deep impression on my mind. Our boy was a tiny baby then but when he grew old enough to lisp a single word, I began to teach him this prayer and tell him the story of the beautiful angels whom God sent to bear the soul of the little boy away. Somehow he was greatly interested in this prayer and asked for the story many times, especially when he retired and we repeated the prayer together. And here I wish to say the sweetest moments I have ever known was when Dorris said his "Good night prayers." I usually told him a story, or if he refused to say them I asked him if he didn't think Jesus felt very badly when he was forgotten, since He let the sun shine on us so brightly during the day, and gave us good health, and made us strong so we could run and play. Just suppose He had forgotten to do all those things for us? This gentle reminder never failed to bring results; he would repeat his prayers sweetly after this and ask for the story of "the little boy."

One Sunday night in August, 1915, we were at supper and I noticed he ate very little and before we were through eating he asked to go to bed. I undressed him very hastily and put him in bed, hurried through the short prayer, as I wished to return to the supper table. He asked for the story, as usual, and I hurried through with it but I noticed that he listened very attentively, and as I was leaving the room he called to me, "Mamma, the angels carried the little boy's soul away, didn't they?" The following Friday the angels carried his soul away. That was his last prayer, for that dread disease, diphtheria, closed the power of speech to the end.

The good we do will never be known to us—the sister who sent the letter to COMFORT six years ago, didn't know the results it would have.

MRS. C. G. COTHRAN.

Mrs. Cothran. Mere words cannot express my sorrow and sympathy for you, but, suffice to say, when I read your letter, tears came to my eyes and I breathed a silent prayer to Him "who doeth all things well" for strength to enable you to bear your sorrow, and I know that the sisters will all join me in this.—Ed.

GA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have long been a subscriber to COMFORT and it is a great pleasure to read each month the brave and helpful letters which the good sisters send. Often after reading some letter that appealed to me particularly I have considered writing but I felt that the other letters were so much better than anything I could write, but since reading "Mrs. Pete's" letter in January COMFORT I just have to write. Dear "Mrs. Pete" you have my entire sympathy in your trial. I feel that I am competent to tell you something which may help you, since I have been in your position myself and know how you feel. In my case my "partner" was a Francisco instead of Pete. I am very well acquainted with many of your husband's nationality and never knew one (though I suppose there are some) that did not make a splendid husband. I married a Spanish boy, seven years my senior, who had been in the United States only five years and the disappointments I had the first five or six years after our marriage could not be enumerated. I had always been accustomed to going around with my kin people and friends whenever I felt like it, and to Sunday school and church regularly but that did not suit my husband. Like yours, he was always kind and gentle but oh, how firm! It caused me many tears and much thought to win out but today, after twelve years of honest effort, I have one of the happiest homes and the best husband a woman could wish for, and I would not swap our four little Spanish-American soldiers for any other kind.

You just continue to be sweet and stay at home with good grace and get yourself interested in your husband's life and habits. Take up a study of the language spoken by your husband's family. You can master it if you but try. Don't, for your own

EASTER LUNCHEON

By Ella Gordon

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

AN Easter lunch should be simple and kept in three colors; white, green and yellow. Yellow place cards should have "Easter Greetings" and an Easter lily in one corner, done in water colors. In the center of table have a decoration of Easter lilies, ferns and smilax, or, if these cannot be obtained, cut a round of cardboard and cover with yellow paper. Around the edge make a border of evergreen tips, and in the center arrange cotton chicks. Glass candlesticks with yellow paper shades add to the table decorations.

The following recipes are appropriate for an Easter meal and will assist in carrying out the color scheme, yet are valuable the year through for noon and night meals.

Aspic Eggs

Make the jelly stock from one large fowl, or from beef and veal together. Cut the meat fine, cover with cold water and slowly bring to boil, then simmer three hours. Into a cheese-cloth bag put one cup of chopped turnip, onion and carrot, a little parsley and half a bay leaf and one tablespoon of salt; add this to cooking stock and simmer one hour longer. Strain, cool, and remove fat the following day. The stock is now ready for use unless it requires more salt and is not strong enough, in which case, reduce in quantity by simmering. Dissolve two tablespoons of granulated gelatine in as much cold water fifteen minutes, then dissolve with half a cup of boiling water. Add to one quart of stock and one tablespoon of lemon juice and strain.

Cook four eggs hard by covering with boiling water and keeping it just below the boiling point thirty minutes. Cover with cold water and let stand until cold. Cut eggs into slices quarter of an inch thick.

ASPIC EGGS.

Pour liquid jelly into mold two inches deep and let harden. In the center and at regular spaces around it, place a slice of hard-boiled egg. Cover this with the liquid jelly and let harden and so on until mold is filled. Decorate with hard cooked eggs shelled, or with eggs in shells tinted pink with beet juice, a sprig of fresh green on center and around edge.

Chicken in Aspic

Prepare chicken to roast, taking special care to tie so it will come out of oven looking shapely. Evenly tie wings, thighs and drum-sticks to body. Put into double cooker and bake chiefly by steaming, letting in the direct heat long enough to brown. Remove strings. Choose large enough mold to hold chicken and put in three inches of liquid jelly described in Aspic Eggs. Lay on the chicken when cold, then a little more jelly and set on the ice until cold; then keep adding a little more and setting on ice until mold is filled.

Individual Chicken Pies

Two cups of sifted flour, five tablespoons of lard, five tablespoons of butter, two thirds of teaspoon of salt and ice water. Work salt and lard into flour and moisten with just enough ice water to form dough. Chill, and roll into three-cornered piece. Chill butter and press to one half the size of rolled dough, and place in center of dough. Fold dough toward center. Fold once more and set to chill again. Roll a little thicker than for pies and cut into rounds six inches across; form into square cups by bringing up the edges, moistening a little with ice water and pinching into shape. Cut square of pastry for each top about two and one half inches across.

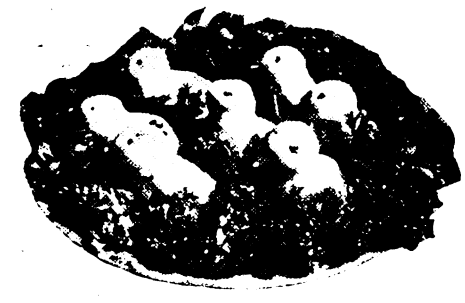
CHICKEN PIE FILLING.—Remove skin and cut chicken into small pieces but do not remove bones. Just cover with boiling water and simmer till chicken will cleave from bones, adding salt twenty minutes before chicken is done. Remove chicken from liquor and bone. Cut into inch pieces. Reduce liquor to one and one half cups by simmering and season with salt and pepper. Mix six tablespoons of flour with a little cold water and slowly add to boiling liquor. Cook five minutes and add chicken and cook very slowly fifteen minutes longer. It should be quite thick when done.

Bake pastry cups and squares to a rich brown and fill with the chicken. Place the square on top and garnish center with a cube of jelly.

Spinach Eggs



Pick over and wash spinach until no grit is found under the curled parts of leaves. Better than several washings in a pan of water, is to put it in half a tub of water and let it soak until crisp when the leaves will be considerably uncurled. Drain and put on to cook without water, slowly bringing to a boil, simmer till tender. Drain and chop fine. Season with salt, pepper and butter. Arrange in mounds and on the top of each place a hard-boiled egg, taking care not to disfigure egg in peeling. Serve with French or boiled dressing.

FRENCH DRESSING.—Mix one teaspoonful of salt with a dash of cayenne pepper and a pinch of white pepper and add two tablespoons of vinegar and four tablespoons of oil. Beat together and stir well just before serving.

POTATO CHICKS.

BOILED SALAD.—Melt three tablespoons of butter with one teaspoon of mustard, one scant teaspoon of salt, one tablespoon of sugar and a dash of cayenne pepper. Cook in double boiler five minutes and pour over three well-beaten yolks of eggs; add one half cup of hot vinegar, one cup of rich milk and the beaten whites of the eggs. Return to double boiler and cook till mixture thickens, taking care it does not cook long enough to curdle.

Potato Chicks

Take mashed potatoes when partly cooled and shape into chicks. Just before serving, put in very hot oven and heat through, and then use end of match whitled to a point for bills and a speck of egg yolk for eyes. Serve in a nest of parsley.

Egg Sandwiches

Mash four egg yolks that have been boiled hard and add one teaspoon of mustard, two tablespoons of vinegar and one even teaspoon of salt. Whip one and one half cup of cream and add to egg mixture a little at a time, and when smooth season with cayenne pepper. Spread between buttered slices of white bread.

BROILED KIDNEYS.—Order veal kidneys with the suet left on. Trim, split, arrange in a buttered broiler and broil ten minutes. Remove to pieces of toast and pour melted butter over it, seasoned with salt, cayenne and lemon juice. Garnish with parsley.

BEET AND POTATO SALAD.—Cut five or six cold boiled potatoes into small cubes. Put a layer of these in salad bowl, sprinkle with minced onion, add a layer of cold boiled beets, also cut in cubes, then a sprinkling of chopped parsley. Proceed with these layers until the dish is full, pour dressing sufficient to moisten well over the whole and put on ice before serving. Garnish with slices of hard-boiled eggs, if liked.

PARSNIP SALAD.—Boil eight parsnips till tender, then cut them in rounds. Cover with finely cut parsley, and lay them in a bed of endive. Make a salad dressing of the yolk of one egg, one half teaspoon of mustard, braided into the yolk. Drop olive oil in, drop by drop, beating all the time. When of a wax-like consistency, add a pinch of cayenne pepper, a pinch of salt and a tablespoon of vinegar. When this is thoroughly mixed, beat the white of an egg to a stiff froth and stir into the dressing. Pour over parsnips.

FANNIE V. TIDD, New York, N. Y.

BRAN MUFFINS.—This is a doctor's recipe and is fine for constipation. One teaspoon of baking powder, one cup of flour, three quarter teaspoon of salt, two cups of coarse bran, one tablespoon of molasses, one tablespoon of butter, one cup of milk, sixteen pecans and twenty raisins. (Pecans may be omitted.) Mix the baking powder, salt, flour and then add the bran. Mix the molasses in the milk and add. Stir all together and bake in gem pans for about twenty minutes. Caution. Fine bran is of no value, coarse bran must be used. Eat three times daily.

MRS. V. O. VAN NORTWICH, Albion, Mich.

CREAM PUFFS.—One cup boiling water, one half to three quarters cup butter, boil, and stir in one cup flour; when cool add three eggs, not beaten. Mix well and drop by tablespoonfuls in buttered pans and bake in a quick oven twenty-five minutes. This makes one dozen puffs. When cool, split and fill with the following: One cup milk, one cup sugar, one egg and three tablespoons flour; stir in the hot milk. When cool, flavor and fill puffs.

MRS. M., Pennsylvania.

OLD-FASHIONED GINGERBREAD.—This recipe is delicious with a good coating of whipped cream, flavored to taste, and we like it much better than any fancy cake. Sift together, two and one half cups flour, one teaspoon soda, one half teaspoon salt and one and one half teaspoons ginger. Mix well together, one cup molasses, one half cup boiling water and four tablespoons melted butter. Add liquids to flour, etc., beat vigorously and bake thirty-five minutes in a moderate oven.

A Happy Mother, King City, Mo.

GINGERSNAPS. (Requested.)—One cup sugar, one cup molasses, one cup butter or meat frylngs may be used, one tablespoon ginger, one teaspoon of soda, dissolved in a little water, and as much flour as can possibly be stirred in (not kneaded); pinch off a piece about the size of a large marble, and roll in the hands, leaving a space between them in the pan to allow for spreading, which they will do when warm; bake in a moderate oven till a nice brown, and leave in the pan till they cool sufficiently to be snappy, which will be in a short time; to warm the ingredients will facilitate the stirrring: if the dough stands a day it will not hurt. The snaps will keep a long time.

with blue gowns and pink ones, with pretty women eying the struggle for partners disdainfully, and plain ones casting tentative glances at each man as he passed by her.

The band began to play at the other end of the room very softly, but insistently. Nerine looked around for Agatha, but Agatha was gone; Kit, too, had found a friend from her own county, and departed; she, herself stood alone among the increasing crowd, looking at a card filled with names of strange men, not one of whom she knew from the other. Was this what people called pleasure—this why they went to balls?"

"Miss Nerine," cried a well-known voice behind her. "Oh, that's right. My mother says be sure not to dance this first dance, and that she will come for you." Then, more softly, "And don't forget me quite, will you? What will you give me? Quick! Here are more people. I must go! But what will you give me?"

What was the matter with her that she could not speak to him? In desperation she handed to him her scribbled card—only one dance on it free. One dance to give to a late-comer for whom she would wipe out every other name at the asking.

Would he ask her? She was trembling. Or would he only write his name in that mean, solitary little blank and go away?

"Why, you have nothing!" His voice was surely disappointed. "Nothing. Oh, yes, you have, Miss Nerine! There are the extras, three at supper time. I can have those?"

"Yes, you can have those."

Would she ever be able to keep that smile of indecent satisfaction off her face?—ever be able to hide from herself that a dead weight has rolled from her heart because a man has asked her for four dances instead of one? Her heart beat suffocatingly as he gave her back her card; the music the atmosphere, were going to her head like wine. More men came up and were introduced to her, and though she had no dances left, they stayed round her like moths at a candle. Lady Satterlee looked at her across the room, well pleased. There was a wife for Bobby, since he must have one. How self-possessed she was; what lovely mockery in her eyes, her smiling lips!

"Tell me something if you know it, Dora," said some one at her elbow. "Who is that girl there?"

Lady Satterlee looked round as one does at a familiar thing, half expected.

"Ah! here you are, back again," she said. "I thought after shaking hands with you I had done with you for the evening," with all her languid drawl.

"Then you flattered yourself, my dearest dear," with the self-same drawl, the self-same manner, only intensified into masculinity.

Lady Satterlee laid her hand on his arm.

"What a pity you are my cousin and ten years younger!" she observed, meditatively. "Do you wish to be made known to the young divinity in white satin? or would you prefer to stay here and call down contempt on my gray hairs by addressing me as dearest at the top of your voice?" she added walking slowly through the crowd as she spoke.

"I have very little choice, it seems," laughing. "By the way, Dora, dance with me a great deal, will you? I am deadly afraid of strange partners, and that boy of yours seems so terribly conscientious about my dancing."

"Dance with you? Oh, once or twice," with cool disdain. "But my object in coming here was to turn the head of Bobby's colonel in order that he may get leave next month."

"Probably." Mr. Fairfax of Fairfax, looked down on his cousin's terra-cotta love locks with indulgence. "I would not interfere for worlds with your domestic arrangements, but you, and you alone, brought me to this dance, and I really must be properly rewarded."

Lady Satterlee laughed.

"Dear Hughie," with a fleeting, exquisite glance, "how I should love you if you were not ten years younger, and I did not remember boxing your ears quite so often!"

Fairfax laughed; he had a pleasant laugh, and it attracted Nerine's attention, for they had all but reached her, where she stood among her admiring army.

"Ah, here you are!" cried Lady Satterlee, lightly. "I have brought my cousin, Mr. Fairfax, to be introduced to you. Mr. Fairfax—Miss Lispenard; to be qute correct, Miss Nerine Lispenard." (Not that it mattered; Hughie would never take her for her sister.)

Miss Lispenard looked straight into the eyes of Lady Satterlee's cousin, and remained perfectly unconscious. Yet they were remarkable eyes. Indeed, the whole man was remarkable, without any tangible reason. He was tall enough, broad enough, but so were scores of other men; Lady Satterlee, in moments of irritation, was wont to say that he looked like a brown bone, and walked like a North American Indian, which meant in English that he was burnt by many suns and always in hard and perfect training. His face was aquiline, thin, square-jawed, and lit by the keenest, sweetest eyes ever set in a man's head.

"I suppose I am too late to ask for a chance?"

"I have none left," Nerine returned, placidly, without a pang, since it did not matter in the least who had or had not any of her dances except those four of Satterlee's.

Satterlee's mother laughed rather proud of her pupil.

"Let me see" she said, taking the scribbled card where it hung on Nerine's finger. "Why not give Mr. Fairfax an extra, a supper dance?"

Nerine looked up, her cheeks suffused with a blush.

"Oh, I—I couldn't," swiftly; "they are all I had for Lord Satterlee, and——"

"Oh, Bobby!" drawled his mother.

"Of course Bobby!" Mr. Fairfax remarked, as he went off with Lady Satterlee. "So that is what you are doing here, you—and Bobby!"

"Hugh, I don't know at all," she returned, gravely. "Sometimes I think it is the sister—and I have taken such a tremendous liking to this one," quite wistfully, "and it is such a new sensation to me to be attracted at all by a girl!"

"So I should think!"—rather dryly, as he put his arm round her naturally and artistically small waist, and they swept smoothly out into the crowd of dancing people.

Maurice was there with Kit, both so young, so admirably mated, that even some of Mr. Mayne's allies regarded them softly.

Nerine was a lovely and radiant sight when Satterlee came to claim her for his first dance.

"I feel as if I had never been alive before!" she cried, laughing as they waited to begin dancing, his arm ready to clasp her waist, and her hand on his shoulder.

She gave a little sigh of pure delight when they had gone once round the room. The band was playing the waltz from "Faust," playing divinely, till each note vibrated keen and sweet on her heart. She danced smoothly, gracefully, without any sense of motion, in perfect rhythm and accord with her tall partner. The room was all a shimmering sphere of light and color to her; the scent of the violets in Satterlee's coat went to her brain, she was dancing into eternity, in pure rapture!

She lifted her eyes to her partner's face; it was the only thing she could see clearly in all the glittering, whirling room, and some things in it turned her cold.

If the music stopped and left her still dancing, she felt suddenly that she would fall.

"Oh, stop!" she cried, breathlessly. "I can't dance another step!"

"Tired?" Unconsciously he held her a little closer.

"No, no! Yes, stop!" she cried, unsteadily, peremptorily, and could scarcely breathe until she was out of the room, in the cool air of the passage away from that maddening, throbbing music. Once outside she put her hand to her head; it felt so odd—not dizzy, but strange. What was the matter with her? Somehow, she did not want to meet Satterlee's eyes.

"I—I have danced my hair into disorder," she said, with a faint smile. "I think I will go and put in some hairpins, if you won't mind waiting a minute."

And she promptly vanished into the dressing-room without waiting for an answer. His four dances all happened to come together; there were minutes and minutes in them; she could spare two or three of those golden moments just enough to get her breath back after that long dance.

She stood looking at herself in the glass, mechanically sticking in fresh hairpins. All the color had gone from her face; she looked pale—looked like Agatha, absurdly and exactly like her.

With a languid step, still more like her sister's, she went out into the passage to join Satterlee, but he was not there. She glanced up and down; something must have called him away, that was the worst of having your host for your partner.

The Kingdom of Our Birthright

In running this series we are not advocating belief in astrology or faith in the pretended talismanic charm of birth-stones, although these beliefs have persisted from remote antiquity and have not a few devotees even in this present age of reason. Yet as myths and superstitions that have dominated through the ages they possess historic interest and educational value. Miss May will appear with a pleasing message next month.—EDITOR.

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

A DESIRE to conquer may be very dominant in the nature of those born between April nineteenth and May twentieth, when the sign of the zodiac is in Taurus. They are determined and unyielding; possess a strong brain and are capable of superior educational attainments, but should guard against rashness in accomplishing a purpose.

MISS APRIL.

Men born on these days may be great imitators. They possess unusual adaptability, an excellent memory, and great mental and physical endurance, which fits them well for public life. They possess fine business intuitions, but in social relations, are quite likely to be governed by their sensations, or influenced by their feelings. Their sympathies are readily aroused, and through this channel may be led to extremes. They should marry women who reason well, and can happily adapt themselves to change, should it become necessary through a varied business career. When young they are liable to over value their associates and be misled by them. They make strong church members and will warmly engage in the defense of a friend. They require to be by themselves for serious thought, and to be alone in making decisions of any kind, for if attempted in the presence of others, they will feel the influence of other minds and be more or less governed by them. They are hard students and will succeed in most lines of education.

Women born under this sign have the same sympathetic nature, and will keenly sense the joys and sorrows of husband and children. If necessary, they are capable of sacrifice without complaint. They easily adapt themselves to the customs of society, but care little for it. They require daily relaxation. When once sure they are right, they are very tenacious to carry it out, and cannot be controlled against their will. They should marry men of honor, capable of making strong home ties.

April Birth-stone is the Diamond, Symbol of Purity

The wearing of amulets to protect the body from harm is of ancient origin. The same custom prevailed through medieval days, and now in modern times we still have many proofs of a lingering faith in the efficacy of amulets.

Conspicuous among the prized amulets of recent years was the little gold charm attached to a gold chain worn by the late Mrs. Annie Yeamans, a woman of beautiful character. Mrs. Yeamans left special instructions that the little amulet be left on her body and buried with her.

Amulets have often been in the form of rings set with the birth-stone, and worn as a luck-bringer, not as a preventive from personal injury. The birth-stone for April is the diamond and symbolizes purity; meaning, to be beautiful within.

Some of the traditional uses of diamonds as amulets are of much interest. One of the latest Parisian oracles says the diamond should be worn on the left hand to attract good fortune.

The superstitious faith of the Russians is illustrated by an amulet in the form of a ring, said to be constantly worn by the Czar as a protection against the danger of assassination which hourly threatens him.

The great Athenian comic poet, Aristophanes, tells of a curious and amusing instance of the diamond's power as a bringer of good fortune: One of the characters in his comedy, "The Clouds," asserts to Socrates that he knows of a stone having the virtue of saving him from the payment of a claim of five talents, for which suit has be n brought against him. This stone was to be found in the stock of those who dealt in medicine, it was transparent and with it fire could be kindled. The philosopher, although familiar with the stone, fails to see how it could be made to help the defendant in a suit at law, and asks Striposiades what he proposes to do with it. The latter is not at a loss for an answer and declares that when the clerk proceeds to write down the charge on his waxen tablet, he, Striposiades, will hold the stone in the sun's rays so that its beam of light will fall upon the tablet and melt the wax, thus quite literally "wiping out the charge."

A writer of the seventeenth century writes with apparent sincerity of belief a wonderful tale to the effect that he had seen a marriage of two diamonds, the two crystals being so firmly drawn toward each other by mutual purity that when put in one place they would cling to one another as with an "unending kiss."

All good and lasting fortune comes from purity within. The mind may receive evil thoughts but, if unapproved, they will not harm, but rather strengthen the character. Wear the diamond as symbolic of this thought.

How to Make Miss April

Miss April reminds us of April showers; also of sunshine, daffodils and violets. She can very easily be made from white and green crepe paper. The doll has a white princess slip on, and the cape is of green. Fashion the umbrella by centering slender strips of wood, or wire at the end of an old umbrella handle or piece of wood; or with a wire cutter reduce the size of an old umbrella frame and cover it with bright yellow paper and twine the handle with purple. A very pretty effect might be obtained by making the umbrella to represent a huge spring flower.

dear sake, listen to anyone who will tell you that if your husband does not wish to go to any place for you to go alone or with some friend of your family. You would be the one who would suffer most from such an arrangement.

I hope Mrs. Wilkinson has room for this for it may be of help to our troubled sister.

With love to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters,
MRS. FRANK.

N. J.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

First let me tell you that COMFORT was "wished" on me, a friend having had it sent to me and out of respect to her I looked over the first copy, not expecting to find anything of interest on account of the unattractive appearance of the paper and the quality of fiction it carried. But—I got as far as the second page and there read such an editorial as I wish we might see in some of the daily papers which are so subsidized by the "business interests" that they dare not print the truth. Then I went from one thing to another, lingering over the Sisters' Corner and winding up with one of the most pleasant and profitable hours I ever spent—with Uncle Charlie.

I have often had the desire to write you but feared that if once started I'd write so much you wouldn't think of printing my letter and as no poor mortal wishes to have his thought "jewels" find a grave in the editor's waste basket, I refrained. However, I'm going to take a chance this time as there are a number of letters in the January number that I'd like to answer.

First, I want to add a word to Mrs. Beegle's comment on hospitals. I have been in three different ones both my children having been born in a hospital, and what a saving in money, worry and work. My boy, who is now eleven years old, has been in the hospital three times, twice for operations and once for pneumonia, and he likes to go. All that one need do is to treat the nurses as human beings, trying to help make one well, and you will find that you receive the best and kindest of care. Mother love can never, in the case of serious illness, make up for professional knowledge and skill. A friend of mine recently buried her baby because she was afraid of hospitals. Few homes among the middle class and none among the poor are properly equipped to care for the sick.

There are some excellent letters on suffrage which I read with pleasure. I shall only take the time to say that I was a member of a "Junior Equal Suffrage League" at the age of twelve, which was eighteen years ago.

Mrs. Alerson has written an excellent letter on the feeding of children and I followed a similar course with mine; they are fine, healthy youngsters of eleven and nine, a boy and a girl. Some mothers pay more attention to the moral training of their children than they do to building sound bodies. Give a child a clean, healthy body and they will have wholesome minds. More evils are generated by improper feeding (meats and highly seasoned foods) than any other agency in youth. It is a well-known fact among students of dietetics that heavy meats and highly seasoned foods tend to abnormally develop the amative nerves in children just as much as drink and tobacco do later in life. Thumb sucking and the use of pacifiers have the same effect.

I want to touch on just one more subject and then I'll leave you.

There is just one thing for the married man or woman to bear in mind if he or she would get along amicably with "Mother-in-law" and that is: that she brought into the world, suffered for, trained and finally gave you your beloved. Whatever whims she may have, however you may differ in opinions, beliefs, etc., just remember that if you love your "better half" and are happy, you have "mother" to thank for your blessing. I had several obstacles to overcome to gain the love of my mother-in-law but for the past five years she has been my best friend and loves me as a daughter. I married an only son of a widowed mother and it took years for me to overcome, first, natural jealousy, which I conquered by never letting him become so absorbed in me as to neglect her. Then there was the question of difference in belief. She is what we call a "hard shell Baptist" while I grew away from the church years ago. However, I never attempted to influence him and while I became dissatisfied with the church, I believe in Christianity and try to lead as helpful and christian a life as I can, and I finally won her respect. I have never had an argument with her, always listen respectfully to what she says and as I had made and kept her boy happy for over twelve years, she can't help loving me. I am sending my children to her church, which, of course, pleases her and proves that I am willing to be fair. We are of different races, different creeds, different political opinion (she is a Southerner, while I was born in the South but of Yankee parents) and she is my mother-in-law, but we are the best of friends and hold each other's love and respect. The mother-in-law is only a problem when we make her so.

And now if you'll forgive me for taking up so much space I will say good by. With best wishes for you all, I am, Yours, MRS. J. M.

LEAVENWORTH, KANSAS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I, too, am a reader of COMFORT and my mother was a subscriber for a number of years before me. I think it is far superior to any other magazine for the price. I look forward to its coming with pleasure. I always turn to the fancy work department first and then to the Sisters' Corner. Last, but not least, the COMFORT League of Cousins. How I laugh, sometimes at Uncle Charlie. I think if we would all be as cheerful as he this world would be a better place to live in.

As nearly all describe themselves I will, too. I heartily endorse it as we get a better idea of anyone thereby and feel more acquainted. I am five feet tall and weigh one hundred and ten pounds. Have dark brown hair, steel blue eyes and am dark complexioned. Am twenty-four years old. I have a twin sister. How many COMFORT sisters are a twin? Have been married nearly five years.

Will tell you of this city or what I know of it, as I have lived here only since last October.

Leavenworth is an old city, having been built before the Civil War. Its close proximity to Kansas City hinders its growing very fast. The population is estimated at about fifty thousand inhabitants. It is about forty miles north of Kansas City and about the same distance south of Topeka, the capital of the state. It is about midway between the two cities on the interurban line. The Missouri river separates this state from Missouri. Several railroads pass through here. The Union station is built on the banks of the Missouri river so we can look across the river and see Missouri soil. There are also quite a number of notable buildings here, the Federal prison, the National Military Home for disabled volunteer soldiers and the fort which stood during the war. Many acres of land have been appropriated by the Government for these buildings. Will tell you of the Military National Home at the Soldiers' Home.

The Military National Home is situated three miles south of Leavenworth on the electric car line. As I have just mentioned, the grounds of this home, which cover six hundred and forty acres, are appropriated by the Government. There are two depots, union and electric, a store, power house, two hospitals, two barber shops (my husband owns one of them) and the main dining-hall with a seating capacity of three thousand people. Six meals are served each day. About seventy-five girls are hired in this dining-hall. All help is paid by the Government.

The grounds are beautiful with flowers and shrubbery. The Floral Globe is a curiosity. It is made of the trunk of a tree, trimmed perfectly round to represent the globe and is covered with moss in the shape of the different countries of the world. It is just as natural a globe as one would wish to see.

The cemetery is also an interesting feature of the Home. It is estimated that about sixty thousand are buried there and it is being filled very rapidly. Each grave is marked by a tombstone. It is both beautiful and sad to see; just green grass (in summer) and the white tombstones as far as the eye can see. Each soldier is buried with the same honors, no difference whatever in the respect shown them. Three "taps" from the trumpet is sounded over the body at the cemetery, also music by the band. A salute of three volleys is fired by the firing squad after the body is lowered to its final resting place.

There are many more interesting things which I could write of the Home but my letter is rather lengthy so will close. Will come again sometime and tell you of the Federal Prison.

Wishing COMFORT's staff success,
Your COMFORT sister,
MRS. DORA WEAVER ROBISON.

Mrs Robison. Yes, indeed, come again and tell us some more interesting things. Descriptive letters are always enjoyed.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I want to tell "Mrs. Pete" that our lives are what we make them. I was married when only fifteen to a man of twenty-seven, and though I think I was much too young I am not sorry. I have been married nine years now and have a little boy, two years and a half old. I lived seven years with my mother-in-law. I am part English and part German while my husband is Bohemian, and though his mother speaks English poorly, we never quarrel. The first two years of my married life was a little like Mrs. Pete's. My husband wouldn't go anywhere with me, and I liked to go around to places of amusement, so sometimes went with his younger brother, who was only a little older than I. In fact, I went with him more than I did with my husband until he showed signs of being jealous and then I stopped and stayed at home and am staying there yet but, dear Mrs. Pete, it is ten times better to give up a little of your pleasures than to give up your husband if you really and truly love him. Don't you think so? It was a number of years before I learned enough of their language so I could understand it but now I can, and maybe when you have been married nine years instead of two, you will think as I do. I suffered much, but my baby and husband are worth everything to me.

I do not believe in divorce and don't think that anyone else does who reads the Bible. But if a divorce is really necessary, don't marry again.

I will leave my address with Mrs. Wilkinson so if this letter goes in print and anyone wishes to write to me, they will send it in her care.

I remain, a COMFORT sister,
"Old Man's Darling."

ARCOLA, GA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

In reading the January COMFORT I came to Mrs. Walter Alverson's letter where she wondered what was the reason so many women could not get along with their mothers-in-law. I will tell you what I think of the question. I believe in the first place that there is a whole lot of jealousy on the mothers-in-law's part. When they have been first for so many years it is hard to share their son's or daughter's affection with anyone else. When I married I thought I would be so kind to my husband's mother that she could not help loving me. Alas, I could do nothing to please her, try as I might and she caused me many heartaches and many sad hours.

Now I am a mother-in-law and I can say truly that my son's wife and I have never had one cross word or thought, and it has been over four years since they were married. I used to say to myself, "If ever I have a daughter-in-law I will surely try to treat her kindly and respect her wishes and rights." Mothers should not expect their son's wife to be as wise as they are, who have kept house for years and years. I have a cousin whose son married a dear little woman but she is a poor housekeeper. But just let anyone mention a word of it to her mother-in-law and they will come up short. She will not hear one word against her son's wife. She told me, "If my son is satisfied, let other people mind their own business." People say to her, "I never saw the like, you and your son's wife are always together, and don't you ever quarrel?" She replies, "No, I love her and when I wish she were a little different about some things, I remember I, too, am not perfect and have charity for others."

I have two dear grandchildren, a girl three and one half years old and a boy one year old. I never had any girls of my own, two boys were my portion, but I kept one for only six years, then God called him Home where he is waiting for mother.

I am raising a little step granddaughter. She is eleven years old.

My maiden name was Howe. If any of the sisters who see this, had or have that name, I should like to hear from them. I have lived in Georgia four years, but came from Pennsylvania. I am nearly fifty-three years old, and weigh one hundred and ten pounds.

With regards to all, I remain, Sincerely yours,
MRS. CORA B. ALLEN.

TIGRETT, TENN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a subscriber to our dear old paper for several years and have received so much help and comfort from the Sisters' Corner that I have mustered up courage enough to ask admittance.

I want to say a few words for the benefit of the husbands who read our paper. I am sure there are many who read even our department, and enjoy it, judging by my own "hubby." Rarely do I get a chance at it until after he has read it from cover to cover.

Husbands, stop and think, are you sure you are doing all you can to make "her" happy, and that the pleasant smile she wears doesn't mask a heart that's longing for relief from household cares? Many a woman goes about with a heavy heart, though with a smile on her lips, because, it seems to her, the one who vowed to love and cherish her always has grown indifferent. He may not have—probably in nine cases out of ten he loves her as dearly as ever and would miss her more than tongue could tell if she were to be away from home even for a week or two, but he doesn't tell her so—there's the trouble. The expression of affection means everything to a woman. "Love lightens labor," is a true saying. No matter how many or how arduous our household cares they go on quickly and smoothly if we but feel our efforts are appreciated by those who love us, but how are we to know if they do not tell us? You know it isn't particularly pleasant to take things for granted or guess at them always. I believe that if husbands only understood how much it means to a wife to be told she is essential to the happiness of the man she loves, how much a little praise or appreciation brightens the day, this "oil of gladness" would not be withheld. It is only because they do not think; they are busy and feel they are showing their affection by providing for the family to the best of their ability.

But loving words cost nothing, and a kiss at the door—or behind the door—when the good man leaves for his day's work, fills a woman's heart with joy and puts a song on her lips which echoes through all the toilsome hours.

Just try this, husbands, and see if I am not right. It takes so little to make us happy—so little to give, so much to the one to whom given.

And we may all, dear sisters, apply this in a general way. Let us remember to show our good will and appreciation to husband, children, friends and neighbors. If we do this we can help smooth the rugged pathway of life in a wonderful way and make ourselves as well as everybody else happier.

I have been married five years and have one little girl, Demetra, three years old.

I will close, hoping that if this letter is published, and in time, some of the sisters will send me a letter shower on my twenty-second birthday, which is April 6th, and if there are not too many I will try and answer all.

Your COMFORT sister, MRS. ALBERT TINKLE.

Mrs. Tinkle. Here's hoping the husbands read your letter, or, at any rate, those who have grown careless and unappreciative—and maybe this rule would work both ways and "us wives" better look to our own conduct. Anybody guilty? —Ed.

EDGEWICK, WASH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have so often wanted to write when some interesting topic has been under discussion, but somehow the time slipped away and a new COMFORT came, full of new letters and each one so much better than I could have written that I was glad I remained silent.

Just now, however, I must speak out to Mrs. Hanna and Mrs. Chris H. Bauer of Terre Haute, Ind. Sisters, as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he. So are we. You are both right in your separate views of the different possibilities of city and country life. The family whose heart is in the city should never attempt to work out their lives in the country and those who love nature, who live in the beauty thereof, who can turn the desert into blossom and can enjoy the silent and wonderful transition of the tiny seed to a full-grown plant, or the song of the wild birds as they carol to their mates, may find the city a very poor exchange. Yet to rear children in the city is just as the parents choose. They need not send the children to the streets for amusement any more than farmers need send theirs to the highways for that purpose.

I have in mind two fine young brothers who for six years alternately delivered an evening paper to me and I always recall their faces with pleasure. The elder completed his high school course and entered the university and no doubt by this time the younger is in college also; nor was this but one instance, for near me lived a building contractor with his family of six, besides his wife he had two sons and two daughters, all lovely young people and the parents told me their children had never played an hour in the street. Instead they were given amusement in the home until such time as they were able to take up positions with salaries.

The city offers many clean positions which children can fill after school hours, and which are not of a nature to overtax their strength or impair their health, and the judicious wife will somehow save a little for a future crisis, so you see it is very well that some of us are farmers and other of us flat dwellers.

Suffragette and Antis, we Washingtonians have the ballot, have had these many years and still we are just the same as ever, it's like a new hat, soon old, nothing to disturb the even tenor of life, unless it be an office seeker.

We enjoy COMFORT Sisters' Corner very much for we learn of the different possibilities in different sections of the United States.

Respectfuly your sister, MRS. F. D. ROBERTS.

NORTH CAROLINA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a subscriber for years and could not get along without COMFORT which is a great help to me. I cannot tell which department is the most useful and entertaining to me, for I find much of value in all of them. I read the stories, which are always good, then the Sisters' Corner and when I get them all read I feel so hungry for more letters that I turn to Uncle Charlie's department and devour his letter, the cousins' and his replies. Now, as I feel very much satisfied, I lay my paper aside and let my mind digest what mental food I have taken from all the departments mentioned.

Now Uncle Charlie, don't get jealous because I read your department last for doesn't the dessert come last? That is what Uncle Charlie's department is termed by me, "the dessert."

After I have digested what I have taken, then comes a variety of the different departments not read and I finish up with "Crumbs" as my finishing dessert. Yes, I am very fond of Crumbs, especially "COMFORT Crumbs," for they make an excellent pudding.

Sisters, you all write splendid letters. I enjoy reading them and wish I could write as interestingly and were competent to discuss some of the important subjects mentioned.

The mother-in-law question is one that I would like to solve, but it is quite difficult, as people are so opposite in their views. But I say this, my sympathy is with the mother-in-law and it reaches out to the stepmother, too.

Then there is another poor sister who needs all your sympathy; she is the despised "grass widow." You who talk of divorce being such a sin, think of a poor, weak woman being bound to a man that angels could not live with. Would divorce make the matter worse or would it better it any? I cannot see that the trouble would be mended by a divorce but I believe it would give the woman more confidence in herself.

May God's blessing rest on the entire COMFORT staff and on the COMFORT sisters.

Would be pleased to get letters from the sisters. I leave my name and address with Mrs. Wilkinson.

EL CENTRO, CALIFORNIA.

DEAR SISTERS:

Though often impelled with a desire to write, I never have, and now it is really Mrs. Alta Beegle's letter that prompts me.

I was in the hospital the latter part of July and in August. I had never been in one before except to see my precious brother who had a broken leg. If we had sent him there sooner we doubtless would have saved him unutterable pain and perhaps the loss of his leg finally. It had gotten to the place where it had to be taken off or lose his life. But, he lived, and got well and strong, only to leave us suddenly, and without warning in December last. And, when I think how I came to the land of sunshine, for happiness and health, and some wealth, why it all seems a mockery to me. I dare not plan for the future lest something arise to confront and mock me. Happiness? Why, I have so often written back to those I love in the far Southland and told them I was so unutterably happy—too happy to last. It was true. Happiness is a myth—we pursue it and think we have found it—reach out after it, and it bursts like a bubble. I have my happy times and then something crashes down on me, and I am afraid to seek it further. When I look into the future I cannot imagine any special joy in thinking of the good things it could bring to me. I get in a melancholy mood and feel that nothing is worth while. Then, I try and arouse myself for the sake of those dear to me—who love and need me every day. But, when I think of my brother, I am so bitter toward an unkind fate. I do not blame it on God. Not his tragic death. Since then I cannot seem to right about face and plan for great things as was my wont. As for wealth, I just want enough to make us comfortable, and secure for old age. And enough to buy some poor one a wooden leg oftentimes, wheel chairs for those who need them, and for others food and clothes. For others, money for an education, but in California it seems to me the very poorest stand a splendid chance for good educations. I love California—even as he did who came before me, blazing the way as it were. He was a wonderful boy and carried on a man's size job, with one leg a wooden one.

Now for the hospital. If ever I am ill again I hope to be so fortunate as to enter its doors again. I loved every nurse I came in contact with. I was there five weeks. And this is the hottest place imaginable—the Imperial Valley. But, I lay there and played "make believe" I was in the mountains at a summer resort taking a rest cure along with my other treatment. One nurse was a Scotch lassie, and her smile was like the sunshine, as quick and ready as could be. Her feet seemed to never tire of running, or going at a rapid rate along the corridor. To myself I called her "My bonnie Scotch Lassie." Then, there was the nurse from London, with lots of good, common sense. I thought it was grand to have nurses from the auld countries. And a San Diego girl who was so beautiful, we called her the "Pretty One." Then, the nurse who might have been just a high school girl, without her uniform; she was a dear. And last, but not least, I come to the Sisters of Mercy who run the hospital. I revered and loved them every one. Those dear, pure faces, I took every opportunity to gaze upon. And, words cannot tell how kind they were and good, nor how much I grew to love them. And, when trouble came, there arose before me the sweet face of one of them, so calm, as if used to the sadness of life, so I called her over the phone. "Just to hear your voice," I said. She knew and understood, I'm sure.

And here is my advice. When you are ill and can do so, by all means go to a hospital and be cured. If you go in time, you are apt to be. It is the putting it off until something sets in that is dangerous. It certainly was a Godsend to me. I was taken good care of. Before we knew anything about hospitals we had that ignorant feeling toward them that so many have, but since my brother's and my own experience we are grateful for them.

Now for a change of subject. I voted for Wilson and prohibition, and feel it is my just heritage that I do vote. They wouldn't let me in the South—not those men—too many women are slaves in the farm country in the Southern states. Some of them do not know that they are, a few are gradually rubbing their eyes, and thinking, but some go on in ignorance and indifference.

Now, I do not say that all women in the South are slaves, for they are not, but I have lived among the different people of that country, my work and playtime allowed me different fields, and I was observing. So, I married a Southern boy, and we agreed there'd be no bossing, that each would do as we pleased. We agreed on a lot of things beforehand, and we have never yet agreed to disagree. For pure, courteous, old-fashioned chivalry, hunt and find it in the Southland. For true, pure old-fashioned modesty in the young womanhood hunt for and find it in the South. You will find it everything, but it grows as naturally there as does the rosy cheek and bright eyes of the Southland's virtuous girls. There are pleasures there not to be found elsewhere, but give me the Imperial Valley yet a while. I love this Western air and the freedom it allows its women. I like the Western idea of its women being pals to their men. And the school system here cannot be equaled in many places. Now, when I read the little fifteen-year-old Georgia girl's letter, I wanted to applaud her. I like the way she stood up for her state. Her loyalty was beautiful indeed. I am glad the school system is so good where she is. I guess she never has been in parts away back—and yet not so far from the place they call civilization! Away back where a few little dirty, half-starved looking children came to learn their A, B, C's. And a few more who needed to be in a home for feeble minded. And, again the parent (the man generally) who believed in bringing children to the world ever so often, and who then would plan for the time when they were old enough to work in the fields for him! Oh, yes, I knew him, too, and a recent letter from there gives me infinite joy—there is a law compelling him to send them to school! But a while back the thing that got next to sister and I the most was a woman writing to her beloved son. She comes of the good old blue blooded families, and indeed she has just reason to be proud of her ancestors and kin, since they went to make history in Georgia. Well, her son came to the Golden West to make his stake. He flittered about, and tried one thing and then another thing. He came expecting to find an uncivilized place like he read about in the good old days. He was surprised and doubtless disappointed to find it ahead of what he left behind. He said that the new schoolhouse they were building here, the second high school, was ahead of anything in the capital city there! But, his dear mother wrote her boy to come back to civilization! Well, we laughed! Oh, civilization, thou much abused and misused word! Are you bounded by East or West, North or South? Every place has its advantages and disadvantages. And here we find people from the different parts of the world. Good, bad, indifferent. Some of the best people on earth live here. While again there is no doubt either the right way or the evil in this new place. School is free, and the word free has no strings tied to it as it has in some places. In grammar school they furnish the books. No tuition to pay either. None to pay in High. If I were younger the pride of my days would be to enter high at this place. Oh, how my people do love these schools! There seems to be a magic about them indeed.

Yours, L. S. M.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

One of the most highly appreciated gifts I received in the past year was a subscription to COMFORT. I am enjoying it immensely, especially the Sisters' Corner. Shakespeare said that we "look behind us and before us but never around us"—a hint to value fully the present moment; and Dickens tells of the woman who was so wrapped up in the heathen of Boroboolah Gha, that she could never unwrap long enough to attend to the needs of her very large family. But neither the dramatist nor the novelist would have any reason to reproach our Sisters' Corner in any such way, for every sister seems alive to the needs and the opportunities of the here and now, in problems little and big. And how fast the problems come! It takes considerable mental activity to keep up with them for things are happening so fast in the world that like Alice in Wonderland, "you have to do all the running you can just to keep in the same place." But how fortunate we are, in having that master mind, Uncle Charlie, to encourage and inspire us, to help us clear away the difficulties, sorrows and evils that beset society!

As a slight token of my appreciation of COMFORT and of the great work done by Uncle Charlie, I enclose four subscriptions to be credited to the Home Fund, and will try to send more later. Sisters, have a dead letter. The children wait outside the picture palaces and get some older person to take them in. They pass the price of their ticket to the older person who purchases two tickets instead of one and who of course never stops to think that he or she is breaking the law. In our libraries only so much fiction is handed out to the applicants for books. Our film censors should see that at least sixty per cent of the pictures thrown on the screen are of educational value. There is plenty of good and beautiful stuff in this world ready to be flashed before the eyes of dull-witted humanity, something that will make them less dull witted and sharpen their slumbering brains, things that will uplift instead of degrade, things that will send people scurrying to the libraries for more and more information concerning the subjects that have appeared to their eyes and stimulated their thoughts. The world is still intensely, densely ignorant. Our children learn little. They leave school early, and it is after they leave school that culture and knowledge and worth-while information must be acquired, if at all. That culture in the olden days came from reading. The young person who hadn't read Dickens, Scott, Hugo, Dumas, Thackeray, Cooper, Hawthorne, Charlotte Bronte, Washington Irving, and the works of a number of other great authors, was regarded as an ignoramus. Today these young people are getting their education from Charlie Chaplin and Theda Bara. Today they are putting on pictures that make a specialty of nudity. Mark Twain's jest about the lady who was dressed in a smile is a jest no longer. She is on exhibition in the movies the country o'er. The average child of today thinks of nothing, cares for nothing, but the nickel or dime that can be earned or stolen and converted into a seat at the movies. Their eyes are familiar with every form of vice and crime. Do you wonder this growing generation has no patriotism and no soul? The good we get from reading is not in the development of a story, it is in the delineation of character, the study of beautiful and inspiring language, the uplifting thoughts, the mental stimulus induced by close association with genius and greatness. Reading makes one acquainted with all the great minds of all the ages. We can walk, talk and live in daily association with the noble and the great. Our body is made up of what we eat, the mind of what we read. If you want a harvest you must sow the ground with seed, if you want culture and knowledge you must sow your brains with seed thoughts garnered from books in which have been stored the wisdom of the ages. My publisher informs me that his output of books has fallen off one half during the last few years, thanks to the movie and the auto, principally the former. Nearly all publishers have the same tale to tell. We want more readers, not fewer. Recently New York was treated to a magnificent production of Shakespeare's Merry Wives of Windsor. That production was exquisitely artistic and beautiful and I sent Maria and the Goat to see it. But, alas! it played to empty seats, and had to be taken off. If the metropolis of the country cannot support one Shakespearean production, what can be expected of the rest of the country? When New York wants to be entertained it goes to the movies or to see such shows as "The Midnight Frolic," "The Century Girl," "In For The Night," "For the Love of Mike," "Up-stairs And Down," etc. What chance could Shakespeare possibly have in a mess like that? Well, I've put you mothers and fathers wise, the rest is up to you. Eternal vigilance is the price of more than liberty, it is the price of everything else that is worth while. I'm delighted Edna, to know that my advice on indigestion has helped your friend so much. There is a side to medicine that few seem to know anything about, and that is the patient's side. Doctors are all too busy chasing the dollar to study that side, and that is a side I know more about than most people. I'm not surprised that doctors did not help your friend, for though in America we have some of the very finest doctors in the world, the medical profession in the U. S. on the whole, at least eighty per cent of it, is woefully below the standards that obtain in Germany, Austria, France, England and other countries of the old world. It is a pity that it is so, but it is so. If half the preachers and half the doctors would go to road mending and make room for abler and more conscientious and better educated and more efficient men, both the body and the soul would have a better chance of being what they ought to be.

HYSHAM, MONT.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

As I thought I would write you for the first time, I have read so meny of the cousins' letters and they were so interesting. I came to Montana in 1908 and there was only one store and post-office combine. There were only sixteen pupiles to go to school, now there are two hundred and eighty-three. I am five feet one and a half inches tall, weigh one hundred pounds. Have blonde hair, gray eyes and light complected. Their are only four in our family. Guess my age between thirteen and seventeen. Hoping to hear from the cousins. GOLDIE BARTLEY.

Goldie, I am quite interested in your rediscovery of Montana. Montana is a big state and sparsely settled, but honestly I did think it contained more than one store and post-office combine, and I also thought there were more than sixteen pupiles going to school. In my days there were no "pupiles" in Montana. I suppose these have been imported in recent years. Maybe you are referring to a kennel instead of a school, and these "pupiles" are a new kind of pup. That's quite a jump from sixteen "pupiles" to two hundred and eighty-three and all this in seven years. Evidently there is no race suicide among the "pupiles" around Hysham, Montana. But honestly I can't understand what has become of Montana's population. I have a very distinct recollection some twenty-four years ago of seeing three people in Great Falls, and at least two and a half in Helena; and one Sunday morning I counted more than three hundred big, husky guys hanging on to the rail of a booze foundry in the smoky city of Butte, and there was a store and post-office combined in each of these populous and bibulous cities. This store and post-office combine would suggest that Uncle Sam was going into other lines of business beside that of selling stamps. It would even suggest that he was selling soap, though they did not use much of that commodity in Montana when I was there. Guns, poker chips and high balls were the staple commodities a quarter of a century ago. Now the poker chips and the booze have been canned, senatorial seat stealing has become a hobby of the past, and a lady, Miss Ranken of Missoula (God bless her) the first woman to represent her sex in Congress, will be doing her best to put our national pork and gab factory in order by the time this reaches your eyes. Some state Montana, even if it does fill the educational establishments of the seething city of Hysham with "pupiles," I shall be very glad to see Uncle Sam in the combine business, and if he will combine the telephone, telegraph and the railroads with the other lines of business in which he specializes, I shall be very grateful. Government ownership of public utilities has always been and will continue to be, my slogan. It is the slogan of every wide-awake, efficient country. Why not ours? Why should this country always lag behind in the procession of progress just to oblige a few two-legged hogs? If we are to meet the competition of the nations of the old world (and we shall have to meet it for they by the way are organized to the last shoe button) we shall have to have industrial preparedness, as well as naval and military preparedness, and that will mean that Uncle Sam will have to do a lot of things for public use which can be done a great deal better than they are now being done for private profit. If it is good for the telegraph to click in every post-office in Europe, it ought to be good business for it to be clicking in our post-offices. The goat says that Goldie means post-office and store combined, and not combine. Ah, Billy that makes a great difference, and it is about time that Hysham, Montana knew what a vast difference there was between that once innocent, but now, sinister word, combine, as applied to big business, and that still inoffensive word combined. Meanwhile Goldie you fill the Hysham schools with healthy pupils, and can the "pupiles," and when you get them canned, sit on the lid, for take it from me they are a dangerous bunch to have around.

BLACKSBURG, CAL.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I certainly enjoy reading your replies to the letters in COMFORT. The answers you give are so funny. My mamma has taken the COMFORT for over fifteen years. Everytime she gets it I read the letters in it. We live three miles from Blacksburg. My brother and I ride a mull to school it is very disagreeable in the winter it is light when we start out and dark when we get home. Uncle Charlie did you ever ride a mull? I have two sisters and one brother. They are younger than me. It is snowing. We have five inches of snow. If you was up here I would snowball you.

Your niece, MARY E. RENICK.

So Mary, you ride a "mull" to school do you? As one of my Irish Goats used to say "Pwhat's a mull?" I've heard of all sorts of animals, even that most fiendish of all animals the motor cycle but I never heard of a "mull." The Goat says he thinks you mean a mule and not a mull. I am very sorry to hear the mule is disagreeable in the winter. It seems to me a mule ought to be good tempered in the winter. In the summer any animal has good cause to kick, but a well-fed, well-groomed mule, ought to be in its glory in the winter time. I know I would think it a pleasure and a privilege if I had the job, Mary, of transporting you to school. One thing however I don't understand about that mull or rather that mule. You say it is light when you start out and dark when you get home. How is it the mule is able to change its complexion in that extraordinary manner in so short a time? The Goat says maybe you put face powder all over it when you start out in the morning, and that the powder gets jolted off while jogging around the road to and from school. The leopard changes its spots, but I never heard of a mule changing its color. Of course the mule will change its spots, if you build a fire under it, but as we are not allowed to build fires under animals, except when we are cooking them for the table, the mule does not change his spots very often. What's that Billy? Mary means the ride to school is disagreeable in the winter, and that it is light when they start out and dark when they get home? She refers to the color and appearance of the atmosphere and not to the mule? Oh, pshaw! Wouldn't that jar you? Well it's not my fault if people won't punctuate their letters, and are, as a consequence, misunderstood. People who write for publication, even boys and girls, should be careful to see that their letters make sense and not nonsense. The Goat says if ever the boys and girls of America start composing perfectly grammatical letters, my job will be gone. The Goat says I am living on the mistakes of others. That old bewhiskered villain is wise to me; but my conscience is clear. Half the world lives on the mistakes of the other half. The kings of Europe live on the mistakes of their fool subjects, the pork hunting politicians in Congress live on the mistakes and the blind stupidity of the pin heads who elect them. The lawyers and judges live on the mistakes of the lawless and criminal. The ministers, bishops and priests live on the mistakes, the errors and the sins of the wayward backsliders who support them. Rockefeller and Carnegie live on the ignorance, and stupidity of people at large. The only difference between myself and the other people I have referred to is that I am trying to correct the mistakes of humanity instead of trying to perpetuate them and get fat on them. So after all I'm not such a wretch as the Goat would make me out to be, and there is another thing to be said in my favor, I never rode a mull to school.

SHULLS MILLS, N. C.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Will you let a North Carolinian join your happy band. I live in the mountains of western North Carolina. Western North Carolina has the most beautiful scenery in the state. The Blue Ridge, which traverses the western part of the state is noted for its many beautiful peaks, mountains and valleys. Being thus situated, it affords a very healthful climate. Many people in the summer come up into the mountains and spend the summer at the beautiful little summer resorts, Blowing Rock, and Boone.

I think COMFORT is the best paper I ever read. I already have your story book, it sure is a treasure. I am going to get the others.

I am twenty years of age, fair complexion, blue eyes, weigh one hundred and twenty-five pounds. Uncle Charlie, I want to study for a trained nurse. People tell me it is a very hard job. I don't think there are many easy jobs these days. What do you think about it? I haven't decided where I want to go to yet. I know it takes lots of nerve. I think it takes nerve to do anything.

I wish some of the cousins were here we would go sleigh riding, the ground is covered with snow and you also, dear Uncle Charlie, you could sit in the middle and you wouldn't fall out.

Tell Maria and Billy the Goat, I think they are two sweet girls and wish I could run over and chat with them a while. As this is my first attempt, I will close. Your cousin, ADA WILCOX.

Ada, I am glad your climate is healthy. It seems to me all climates are healthy, for I never saw or heard of a climate going to the doctor and handing out a two spot, and I never saw one die yet. Gee, I wish I was a climate instead of a human "bean." Maybe some of you who are thoroughly acquainted with your state can tell me how it is that North Carolina is so chock full of invalids? A healthy climate ought to go a long way toward producing healthy people. About seventy-five per cent of our bedridden shut-ins are the victims of rheumatism. Rheumatism, like the goblins, is going to get you if you don't watch out, and North Carolina is full of rheumatism, and what North Carolina has not got in the way of rheumatism Virginia seems to have appropriated. From what I can find out from inquiry and observation, I have come to the conclusion that most people become rheumatic invalids from neglect. For that matter however, it is neglect that kills most people. Rheumatism however usually takes from thirty to forty years to kill its victims. It is less merciful or more merciful than tuberculosis according to a person's point of view. However, if you people who get a twinge of rheumatism would immediately get busy and cure the attack in its infancy, our shut-in columns would contain fewer names of people in need of help. If you get a twinge of rheumatism in the joints rub the affected parts immediately with oil of wintergreen and always have plenty of flannel on hand so as to keep the parts good and warm. I don't need to tell you to cut out meat, for I imagine with meat at its present price, few of you ever get any to eat. When you feel the rheumatic twinges or any other twinges of pain, the causes of which you cannot locate, or any feverish conditions arising from grip, cold or rheumatism, take a cathartic in the morning. Whatever the ailment and whatever other remedy may be required it is necessary to keep the bowels free and active, and this alone in many cases is all the treatment needed. So Ada, you want to study for a trained nurse do you? What an awfully obliging girl you are? You must think a great deal of that young lady you are going to study for, but what kind of a nurse do you think she will make, if you do the studying she ought to be doing herself? You bet trained nursing is a hard job and it cannot be done vicariously. Billy the Goat says he had one of those vicarious things at home, but it died. There is a great demand at the present time for trained nurses, especially in New York. Don't however come to New York with the idea of taking up nursing unless you are a high school graduate, and can work like a horse for three years, be ready to get an attack of diphtheria, which few nurses escape, and be exposed to all sorts of contagion. You also want to have the heart action of an athlete and the self control of a Roman matron, for unless you have a face like a cream puff that has been trodden on, the young house doctors won't give you much peace. I spent six years in hospitals and institutions and, believe me, there is not much that I don't know about them. Meanwhile, Ada, Billy the Goat says you should train to be a nurse, but don't train for a nurse. Never encourage laziness by doing for others what they should do for themselves.

302 Shelby St., Silver Grove, NEW ALBANY IND.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have been reading your letters for a good while and should like to join your merry circle. I should like to correspond with someone. I belong to the Aloha Club. I like to read. I am in the sixth grade. I have brown hair, brown eyes and dark complexion. I go to Silver St. school. I can hardly wait till Monday, that is when we have our school test. I just love them. This is Sunday afternoon and I feel so lazy and stupid I can't do anything. I wish someone would write me and tell me what to do for laziness. I don't want to do this and I don't want to do that. I don't want to take my music lesson. Well as I have written enough for the first time I think I will stop.

Your niece, DOROTHY RODGERS.

So, Dorothy, you want a cure for laziness do you? The best one I know would be to have a little visit from Billy the Goat. He has butted the laziness out of quite a few people. If Billy's horns scientifically applied, do not get results, you might pay a visit to where the spank weed grows. Before I spanked the laziness out of you, Dorothy, I'd try and find out if you were in good health. Inertia and disinclination to work is as often due to sickness as it is to sloth and ignorance. Laziness is often the result of overfeeding as well as underfeeding. The wrong kind of diet too, and especially a badly balanced diet may lead to inertia. Humanity is constitutionally lazy. Most of us would rather have the other fellow do what we ought to do ourselves. We go through life on the principle that it is much better to have George do the things we ought to do. We are always seeking excuses for pushing our bur-

Fifteen Minutes of Frightfulness

By Charles Baker Gilbert

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

IT was Sunday morning. "Well, what of it?" you ask impatiently. Much, in this instance; had it been a weekday, Jones would have been down at the office when the cat—but wait, let's tell it properly.

Jones was an exceedingly diffident young bachelor who rented the third floor front room in the widow Brown's home. In his timid, bunny-hearted way, he was in love with the charming young widow, but the mere thought of proposing to her scared him out of his so-to-speak wits. On more than one occasion, the widow, who had already decided that he was to be next, had endeavored to make it easy for him, but invariably Jones had retreated in deadly terror.

Ten o'clock, Sunday morning, found Jones sitting in his room, deeply absorbed in the Morning Howl's account of a sensational murder and suicide that had taken place in that very neighborhood the night before. He had just reached this delectable detail:

"On entering the kitchen, the police found the bodies of husband and wife lying together in a pool of blood. A smoking revolver, gripped in the man's hand, told the tale. Smith and his wife had separated some months previously. To support herself, Mrs. Smith had rented a furnished house and taken roomers. Smith, fancying that the male lodgers were attentive to his wife, called at the house about nine o'clock last night, and after a violent scene, heard by several neighbors, shot her twice, then sent a bullet through his own——"

Bang!

Jones dropped the paper, catapulted from the chair and started for the window. Half-way there, his starboard pedal extremity encountered a torn place in the carpet, sending him sprawling. In his fall, he clutched the lace curtains of the window, tearing them down; the pole followed suit, plunging into the water pitcher; the whole mess landing on Jones most delightfully.

"—— —— —— —— ——" (His remarks deleted by censor.)

Bang! Bang!!

Those surely were pistol shots; this time they seemed to come from the floors below. Jones scrambled to his feet, surveyed the wreckage about him, then scurried out of the room, half fell down the stairs, and rushed madly through the second floor rooms. They were all empty—no sign of a disturbance of any kind.

Down the first flight of stairs he stumbled and into the darkened parlor, where he fell over something soft. The yell that followed made every hair of his head stand on end! Only the cat, wakened from her nap by the disturbance—now backed into a far corner, green eyes glaring balefully, hissing like the traditional stage villain. Jones loathed cats—this one in particular. Another time he would have hurled something at it; the present situation however left no time for such pleasantries. With a muttered imprecation on all cats, he rose cautiously, groping his way out of the gloom. In the dining-room he found no clue. Reaching the kitchen, the door of which was closed, he had just laid his hand on the doorknob when——

Bang! Bang!! Bang!!!

Jones jumped at last a foot in the air. His heart nearly jumped out of his mouth. Jumping Jupiter! Everything jumped!

Those shots had certainly been fired in the kitchen! Seizing the knob, he found the door locked. "Mrs. Smith!" he shouted—"Mrs. Smith!!!!"

No answer—or did he fancy that he heard a sound resembling a dying gasp? And now, to his utter horror, a dark red stain slowly started seeping under the door! Some people cannot endure the sight of blood; Jones belonged to this class. He gulped, stared dumbly at the dull patch of red slowly advancing, then he dashed wildly out of the house to find a policeman.

To state that he failed in his search is so utterly bromidic that we hesitate to impart the information; truthfulness however, compels the assertion. With trembling steps he returned to the house of horror and tore the telephone receiver from its hook.

"Hello! Hello!! Hello!!! Police Headquarters—quick! Murder just committed here—what? Get off the line—Get off! How's that? This is Police Headquarters? Come at once—murder just happened—murder and suicide both, I think—hurry up! Where? Oh, Lord! I forgot—Seventeen-eight-five, West thirty-seven Street—hurry!"

Waiting for the arrival of the police, Jones paced up and down the little parlor like a caged beast. (We believe this is the correct way to pace in such cases; at any rate, he paced). Twice he strode out towards the kitchen, but each time the sight of that gruesome red stain oozing under the door sent him back shuddering.

"Ugh!" he gulped "Good Lord!"

What could it all mean? Was this another murder case similar to that in the paper? Mrs. Smith was a widow—at least so he had been informed by no less a personage than that charming young woman herself. Her husband had been dead these three years—at least so she had told Jones. She had one little daughter, Dorothy, a chubby, flaxen-haired tot of five summers—had the little girl been murdered too?

It was horrible. More, it was inconvenient. Jones mentally pictured himself figuring in a sensational murder case. Perhaps he would even be charged with the crime. It was simply appalling!

"So she was a grass widow!" he groaned. Further remarks were prevented by arrival of the police—a Sergeant and two patrolmen. With a shudder, Jones pointed in the direction of the kitchen, then followed the bluecoats with trembling footsteps.

They halted at the closed door, where that ominous dull red stain hinted of nameless horrors beyond.

"Break open that door!" thundered the Sergeant.

As the door gave way, a shrill little feminine scream issued from the parlor. Wheeling in amazement, Jones beheld the widow in street attire, with Dorothy clinging to her skirts in fright.

"Whatever is the matter?" gasped the widow. "What are these policemen doing here?"

Coming closer, her gaze fell on the now exposed interior of the kitchen, which indeed resembled the scene of a bloody conflict—walls and floor spattered with dull red.

"Oh, my catsup!" she screamed. "Half the bottles exploded, and I worked so hard over it!" She began weeping hysterically.

The men stared stupidly at one another for a moment; then a broad grin spread over the Sergeant's face.

"It's all right, Mum—this young fellow's nutty, that's all! Come on, men!" The police tramped out, leaving poor Jones to face the music alone!

Trembling with mixed emotions, he turned to the widow; he found her regarding him with amusement, in spite of her tears.

"You're as white as a sheet!" she laughed nervously. Then—"Dorothy, let that catsup alone—go right up stairs this minute, and change your dress!" Dorothy disappeared, licking her tiny fingers.

Jones turned once more to the widow. "Well?" she queried.

"Mrs. Brown—Stella—I thought——" he stammered in utter confusion, turning from deathly pallor to a rich red that rivalled the catsup in hue. Great drops of perspiration broke out on his brow. Would he never be able to say it?

It was abominable!

With a herculean effort he tried again. "I—er—you see, I—well, I thought you had been murdered—like a woman I read about in this morning's paper, and—well, I just couldn't stand it, Stella!" he finished lamely.

"You poor dear!" murmured the widow. "You cared that much?"

For Mr. Jones, the room was rocking. Suns, planets, comets, whole constellations and solar systems flashed before his dizzy gaze. His lips parted, but he found himself speechless; his knees knocked together painfully.

And then, in a flash, an inspiration came to him. Now or never! If words failed him, so much the worse for words!

Bracing himself for a last, grand, superhuman effort, he took one stride and swept her into his arms!

With the Fingers! Corns Lift Out Without Pain

Corns and Calluses Stop Hurting at Once and Lift off Without One Bit of Pain.

This tiny bottle holds the wonder of wonders. It contains an almost magical drug discovered by a Cincinnati man. It is called freezone. It is a compound made from ether.

Apply a few drops of this freezone upon a tender, aching corn or a hardened callus. Instantly the soreness disappears and shortly you will find the corn or callus so shriveled and loose that you just lift it off with the fingers.

You feel no pain or soreness when applying freezone or afterwards. It doesn't even irritate the skin.

Just ask in any drug store for a small bottle of freezone. This will cost but a few cents but will positively rid your poor, suffering feet of every hard corn, soft corn, or corn between the toes, or the tough calluses on bottom of feet. If your druggist hasn't any freezone he can get it at any wholesale drug house for you. Edward Wesley Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Spring Care of the Work Horse

IT should be remembered that in the spring the work horse is soft after the confinement and lack of labor of the winter season; consequently he should be gradually fitted for hard labor. Just as the athlete has to specially prepare himself for a race or severe test of endurance, so the muscles of the work horse should be got into fit condition for work by exercise, grooming or brisk massage and proper feeding.

Shedding of Hair

At this time of the year the horse is shedding his winter coat of hair, or should be doing so, and this preparation for summer commonly is associated with discomfort, weakness or actual sickness. To help the horse get rid of his coat it is well to stop feeding heating corn and substitute whole oats, wheat bran and oilmeal. The change in feed should, however, be made gradually, for all sudden changes of feed are liable to cause indigestion.

Clipping

If the hair is tardy in shedding it is a good plan to heavily blanket the horse and trot him until sweat is induced. The hair then comes off in great rolls, adhering to the blanket, and the work is completed by brisk use of the curry-comb and handy brush. In cases where such measures do not loosen the coat clipping should be resorted to at once, but if a horse is clipped at this time he should be regularly clipped every spring. It is rare, indeed, for the coat to assume normal polish after clipping has been done; still the practise is a good one, when the horse can be properly blanketed, as it tends to prevent cough, bronchitis or even pneumonia, often caused by sweating and then chilling in the stable.

Partial Clipping

When the condition of the weather will not permit complete clipping of the coat, and a horse is doing poorly, sweating in the stable or showing any symptom of indigestion, partial clipping should be done. This consists of clipping the hair from the legs, above the knees and hocks, and from the belly and on the sides to a line with the breast collar and breeching straps. The hair left on the legs protects the skin and helps to prevent "scratches" or "mud fever" where the horse has to work in wet, slush or mud.

Toughening the Shoulders

At this time it is also well to "toughen" the shoulders for work "in the collar." Nothing surpasses cold water with the addition of two teaspoonfuls of salt per pint, as a lotion for this purpose. Used regularly three times a day it will prevent collar and back-pad sores and at the same time have the desired "toughening" effect. If something stronger is required, as indicated by the appearance of scalded, galled or sore spots where the harness bears and rubs, use a solution of one teaspoonful of tannic or gallic acid and a pint of cold soft water, or a strong tea of white oak bark, or water containing all the powdered alum it will dissolve. Then keep the collar clean and dry and dust its bearing surface with talcum powder before putting it upon the horse.

Caring for the Feet

Attention to the feet also is of prime importance. If the horse has to work hard upon the road or on land that is not of the black prairie type it is best to shoe his feet and to reset the shoes once a month. The hind feet need not be shod if the horse has to work only upon the land, but they should be kept properly trimmed by timely use of the rasp.

In conclusion it may be added that it is best to keep the work horse off grass in the spring, to supply him with cold, pure drinking water before meals and when at work in the field, and to see to it that his stable is kept clean, well ventilated and darkened against flies in hot weather.

Spring Campaign Against Weeds

The fight against weeds should begin early in the season. Later on they have become strong and vigorous and soon get beyond control. A little thought and work now will mean both money and labor saved later on.

Prepare all work land, whether fall or spring plowed, as early as the weather will permit. This makes weed seeds sprout and show above ground before the crop is planted, and harrowing will kill most of them. This treatment is especially successful in combating such weeds as Russian thistle, pigweed, goosefoot, cocklebur, milkweed, common ragweed, giant ragweed or kingshead, and mustard. In fact any of the common annual farm weeds which are perpetuated by means of seed alone can be effectively fought in this manner, though their control is almost impossible later in the season, especially in grain fields, due to their rapid growth and early seeding habit.

If a second crop of weeds develops in the grain fields harrowing is safe and entirely satisfactory until the grain is two inches high. In dry areas this practise is even beneficial to the grain crop, since it sets the grain back very little and forces a more extensive root growth, kills the weeds, and leaves a moisture conserving dust mulch that will not easily be blown away by the wind.

Danger from Grain Smuts and Blights

A recent circular of a middle west experiment station warns against impending danger from smuts and blights in grain. Owing to the cold wet season grain smuts and blights were unusually severe in 1915. The seed oats and barley, then, that will be sown the coming spring will have an abundance of smut spores or "germs" under the hulls, in the furrows, and even inside the kernels. If such seed is sown without first killing the spores, loss from smut is sure to occur and unless prevented will be heavy this year.

HOW TO KILL SMUT.—The Formalin Seed Treatment is the best and most effective for general use on the farm. The cost is extremely low—14 to 15 cents a pound (pint) if purchased in quantities of five gallons or more. The solution used is made up as follows: One pint Formalin (Formaldehyde 40 per cent) in 30 to 35 gallons of water. Mix well. Barrels or tanks are not injured by the formalin and may be used for holding the solution when soaking or dipping the seed. The solution may be used several times, but preferably not more than four or five times.

CAUTIONS TO BE OBSERVED.—Always run the seed through a good fanning mill before any treatment is given. This will remove many of the blighted kernels, the spore balls, many of the free smut spores and dirt.

2.—Avoid freezing the wet grain. Freezing would lower or destroy germination.

3.—When the seed has been treated and is yet damp and swollen the seeder or drill should be set to sow one half bushel (barley or wheat) to three quarters bushel (oats) more to an acre than the usual amount. Soak the seed in the solution in loosely filled burlap or gunny sacks for two hours. Drain on slats over the barrels or tanks to prevent wasting the solution. Dry by spreading on a clean floor, stir occasionally with rake or shovel. It will dry faster if the wind can blow over the wet grain. Sow as soon as the seed will run freely or dry thoroughly and store in clean bags or bins until it is planted. Barley requires a two-hour treatment to kill the leaf stripe and loose smut diseases.

TREATMENT BEST FOR OATS, WHEAT AND RYE.—Dip the seed, in loosely filled burlap or gunny sacks, into the solution and soak for five minutes. Drain and pile the oats or wheat on a clean floor or canvas and cover with sacks or canvas for two hours. It is best to leave rye covered from four to six hours. This covering is important as it prevents too rapid evaporation of the formalin. It is difficult to dry oats if long treatment is applied.

Cultivating the Orchard

It is a well-known fact that ordinary farm crops cannot be successfully grown without tillage. No one expects to produce a good crop of potatoes or corn without giving careful cultivation. Why then should we expect to grow apples, peaches or any fruit without the same care?

Tillage improves the physical condition of the soil, saves moisture and hastens growth. Cultivation also destroys weeds and other pests that may prove of great injury to both trees and fruit. If the trees are choked with grass and robbed of their proper nourishment by weeds they cannot be expected to produce first-class fruit.

While the time and amount of tillage depends upon local conditions it can be stated as a general principle that orchards should be kept free from grass and weeds by clean cultivation during the early part of the season at least.

If it is desirable to add a fertilizer in the form of green manure the orchard may be seeded to clover with oats as a nurse crop. The oats should be cut very early for hay, since their ripening takes a large amount of both moisture and plant food to produce a crop of grain. The growing clover will take nitrogen from the air and, if plowed under, this nitrogen will be added to the soil. If desired, rye or barley may be sown instead of oats as a nurse crop or the clover may be sown under favorable conditions without the nurse crop. However, if clover seed is sown alone it should not be sown on weedy land as the weeds will choke the young clover plants.

If the old orchard has ceased to bear, try plowing it up this spring and giving it thorough cultivation as a part of your plan to help it to produce a crop of fruit.

Watch for Shot Hole Borers

These pests attack orchard trees by boring just beneath the bark. They are first discovered when the trees are pruned in spring. Peach trees attacked by borers exude gum at the point where the injury is made.

When first detected the trees should be treated with a wash made as follows:

One gallon of commercial lime sulphur to eight gallons of water or Stiff whitewash to which has been added a quart of crude carbolic acid to each twenty-five gallons.

This should be applied to the trunk and large limbs with a whitewash brush and to the small ones with a power spray.

Seeds for Late Planting

In selecting seeds for late planting remember to get good seeds. These should be fresh seeds, not over two years old. The corner grocery may keep this kind of seeds but without you know your grocer and can take his word you are likely to get old seeds. Besides, dealers who sell seeds to grocers often palm off poor seeds on them. Even though your grocer may be perfectly honest you may get bad seeds from him. The best way is to take them home and before planting test each package according to directions given in former numbers of COMFORT'S Modern Farmer. In this way you may be sure that the seeds you plant will grow and you will run no risk of losing a crop through planting poor seed.

BE SURE THEY ARE PURE.—With certain seeds, especially the clover and grass seeds, are often found many impurities. Before purchasing these examine them with a glass for bad seeds or weed seeds which they may contain. It is far better to buy pure seeds and make your own lawn mixture than it is to buy many of the widely advertised lawn mixtures and sow dandellons and quack grass and English plantain on the lawn.

TRANSPLANTING.—Many plants, especially those grown from very small seeds, do better if twice transplanted. They should first be sown in pans or boxes and as soon as they are an inch high "pricked out" in flats an inch or two apart each way. Flats are shallow wooden boxes about three inches deep and 18 or 20 inches square filled with good rich growing soil.

When the plants are ready to be set in the open ground, the soil in the flat should be thoroughly soaked and the plants removed without disturbing the roots too much. Besides making it possible to start plants early, before the outside conditions are suitable, transplanting increases the vigor of plants by promoting root growth. However, only those plants developing branching roots can be easily and successfully transplanted. Single tap-rooted plants like cucumbers and melons transplant with the greatest difficulty. Starting such plants in little squares of sod and then setting plant, sod and all out when conditions are suitable is the best way of transplanting such plants. They may also be grown in paper pots and transferred to the outside in the same way, removing the paper carefully after the plant is set in the earth.

Vegetables out of the Ordinary

The Udo

This vegetable was brought into the country about ten years ago from Japan where it is cultivated for both its roots and its young shoots. The only use yet made of it in this country, however, is for its shoots which are cut and used much the same as asparagus. The shoots are blanched before cutting by placing around them an ordinary drain tile.

In taste the udo is somewhat like parsnip. Raw it has a pine taste which is removed by cooking in cold water and parboiling later in two or three waters. It is prepared and eaten much the same as asparagus.

Witloof Chicory

This is a salad plant grown extensively in Europe where it has attained great perfection.

In America it can be grown successfully either from seed or from roots which may be forced in early spring. The seed may be sown in May or June and the roots, to be used for early forcing, harvested about the last of October. It is cultivated during the summer months much the same as any other garden vegetable. The rows should be about a foot apart and the plants should stand about ten inches apart in the row. The best methods of growing chicory for market are discussed in Bulletin No. 418 of the Experiment Station at Geneva, New York.

Poisoning Vermin

Gophers and prairie dogs may be most easily poisoned in the spring when they first leave their burrows after hibernating during the winter months. At this time they will ravenously eat almost any kind of poisoned bait because food is scarce, and each adult animal killed now, before the young are born, is equal to half a dozen killed later in the season.

For prairie dogs and pocket gophers use potatoes or apples as bait. Slit each piece with a knife and insert a bit of sulphate of strychnine about half as large as a grain of wheat. Drop the baits into the mouths of inhabited burrows where it is out of reach of stock. One bait in each hole is sufficient. An average of ten acres of very badly infested ground can be treated each day by one experienced man.

Common gophers and "flickertails" should be poisoned with grain treated with strychnine. One of the best formulas is as follows:

Dissolve one and one half ounces of sulphate of strychnine in a quart of hot water. Add a quart of syrup—molasses, sorghum, or thick sugar and water—and a teaspoonful of oil of anise. Thoroughly heat and mix the liquid, and while hot pour over a bushel of clean wheat and mix thoroughly. Stir in two pounds of fine corn meal, the quantity depending upon the amount of excess moisture present. Allow the mixture to stand over night, taking care that there is no leakage from the containing vessel. Distribute early in the morning. One bushel of poisoned grain will suffice for 1,000 to 1,200 holes. Use one teaspoonful for each burrow. Drop directly into burrows. As strychnine is one of the most deadly poisons the utmost care must be taken to keep it away from all domestic animals and make sure that it is out of the reach of children.

Dirt Roads

Notwithstanding all arguments to the contrary, the dirt road is the best road,—not the poor dirt road or the sand wallow, or the mud hole, but the good dirt road properly built and maintained.

The dirt road is the best road because it is the cheapest to build. A good road can be built from the earth in place for less than one third the cost of macadam or one tenth the cost of concrete road. It is both easiest and quickest to build as the material is on the ground, does not have to be hauled and seldom must be moved more than a few feet.

The big problem of good roads efforts is not the construction but the maintenance of these roads. Earth roads are quickest, easiest and cheapest to repair and if properly built will wear longer than stone roads. Like the construction material, the repair material is always close at hand.

HOW TO BUILD A GOOD DIRT ROAD.—There are two simple rules for building a good earth road which if followed will give very satisfactory results. They are:

1. Get the water off and keep it off.
2. Keep the surface well packed.

Of course it is not always easy to follow these rules, the lay of the land and the character of the soil itself being the two factors which must be contended with.

HOW TO GET THE WATER OFF.—The earth road should be carefully surveyed and levels run and grade stakes set. The water, when the land is shaped to the grade stakes, should run rapidly off and find an outlet so that it will not stand in ditches by the side of the road. If it does it will work back under the roadbed and soften the track.

The road should be crowned in the middle at least two feet above the surface runs, or ditches beside the road. These surface runs should not be more than two rods apart and should be kept so clean that water runs, never stands, in them.

Beneath these surface ditches and from four to six feet nearer the track should be laid lines of tile three feet below the surface. The size of these tile will depend upon the distance from the outlet,—the farther the distance the larger the tile. In all low and wet places cross tiles should be laid beneath the track or connect the two main lines. The surface runs will carry off the excess rain water and the tiles will drain out the excess soil water from beneath the track and make a hard, dry roadbed.

HOW TO KEEP THE SURFACE HARD.—A dry roadbed is the first essential to a hard surface. But loose soil will absorb a large amount of water, hence loose soil should never be left on the roadbed. Whenever it is necessary to repair the track or put on fresh soil it should be immediately rolled down with a heavy roller. After heavy rains which have a tendency to soften the track, thus causing ruts, a King road drag should be run over the surface to level it off and fill up the ruts.

With a hard surface and a dry and well-drained roadbed, a dirt road will cost less to keep in repair than the best stone road.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming.

Questions and Answers

DECAY OF ORGANIC MATTER.—We have debated the following question in our school but can find no answer to it. The question is: "When organic matter rots why does some go to make coal and some to make soil?" Miss H. H., Barnhart, Mo.

A.—Organic matter which goes to make coal does not rot. It is buried so deeply that the air is cut off and, being under great pressure and subjected to intense internal heat of the earth, gas is driven off and carbon—coal—remains. If it "rotted" it would go to make soil. The chemical process is difficult to explain in a few words. Rotting is a process of disintegration by combining with the oxygen of the air, a kind of slow burning.

FOOD VALUE OF OAT HAY.—What is the comparative food value of oats cut while green and cured and fed in the winter as hay, especially as a milk producer?
H. G. E., Holland Patent, N. Y.

A.—Oat hay is better than Timothy, about as good as well cured clover, but not so good as Alfalfa for producing milk.

ONION MAGGOT.—I have no success in raising onions. I planted about one half pound of seed last year and when the plants were large enough to be thinned they turned yellow and died. On pulling them up I found a lot of white worms eating the roots and bulbs. What is the cause? Is there any preventive or remedy?
MRS. J. P., Cle Elum, Wash.

A.—Doubtless your onions were attacked by the onion maggot, the larvæ of a fly. These grubs are hard to get at. The best remedy is to place sand soaked in kerosene near the base of the plants along the row. Use one cup of kerosene to one pail of sand. This is impractical for large fields, of course.

GETTING RID OF THISTLES.—Kindly tell me how to treat a small area that is over-run with thistles.
J. G. Z., Stratford, Conn.

A.—This depends on the kind of thistles. Ordinary bull thistles, if kept cut back and not allowed to blossom, will be killed in two years because they are biennials,—that is, they take two years to mature. It will probably be necessary to cut them a year or two longer since the seed in the soil may not all grow the first year. Canada thistles must not be allowed to produce any green leaves. They spread by the roots. Frequent plowing and harrowing every time green leaves appear, or shading by sowing a heavy crop like hemp or Alfalfa will destroy Canada thistles.

GRAFTING CHERRY TREES.—I would like to know all about grafting cherry trees—in what month it should be done, how long to cut the scions and how far back to cut the limbs they are to be grafted on.
MISS B. Y., New Castle, Pa.

A.—Send to the Experiment Station, Ames, Iowa, for Bulletin No. 10, "Cherry Trees on Their Own Roots," by J. L. Budd. Methods of propagating cherries are described in this bulletin.

WIREWORMS AND ONIONS.—Will wireworms eat onions?
R. R., Freeport, Ohio.

A.—Not as a rule. You are probably troubled with onion maggot. See answer to a similar question on onion maggot in this column.

KENTUCKY AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION.—I want to write to the Kentucky State Agricultural Experiment Station for some bulletins on farming, but nobody here seems to know where it is located. Will you kindly give me the address?
M. C., Augusta, Kentucky.

A.—The experiment Station is located at Lexington and the officials will be glad to send you bulletins on request. Address your letter to the Director of the Agricultural Experiment Station, Lexington, Ky. Also write to U. S. Secretary of Agriculture for list of bulletins published by the U. S. Government for free distribution. Look the list over and then write for such bulletins as you are interested in.

FALL RYE WITH OATS.—I wish to plant about twenty-five acres to fall rye for next year. I have heard that it can be planted in the spring with oats, cut the oats when ripe and thus have the rye ready for next year. We often have difficulty here in getting the oats off the ground in time to plant the rye the same fall, so if I can plant the rye with the oats

LEPAGE'S GLUE HANDY TUBES
A HOUSEHOLD NECESSITY

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for Spring Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

IN these days when housework has been elevated to Domestic Science, and much of its drudgery is lightened by efficient tools and appliances, one will find every good housekeeper equipped with comfortable house dresses and aprons.

A splendid "betwixt and between" model is the cover-all apron, that may serve as a house dress, and which is especially comfortable in warm weather. It may be worn loose or the fullness may be held at the waistline by a belt. Such models are nice in percale, drill, linen, seersucker, gingham and chambrey.

Pattern Descriptions

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH
Unless Other Price Is Stated

2013—Ladies' Apron Dress.—This model may serve as a house dress. Percale, gingham, seersucker, crepe, lawn, alpaca are good for its development.

Cut in four sizes; 34, 38, 42 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires five yards of 36-inch material for a 34-inch size.

1780—Ladies' Breakfast Sack and Cap. Dimity, lawn, chambrey, gingham, crepe, batiste or percale could be used for these models.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large, and requires three and three eighths yards of 36-inch material for the sack and seven eighths yard for the cap for a medium size.

1723—A Neat and Practical Apron Model. The pockets may be omitted.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It is nice for gingham, chambrey, lawn, percale, alpaca and sateen. The medium size will require five and one eighth yards of 36-inch material.

1795—A Practical and Easily Developed Outfit. The dress is good for all wash fabrics, and also for serge, and other woolens. The pattern includes all three garments.

Cut in five sizes; two, three, four, five and six years. It requires seven eighths yards for the drawers, one and one half yard for the underskirt, and two and one eighth yards for the dress, of 36-inch material, for a four-year size.

2006—Ladies' House Dress with reversible closing, with or without chemisette, and with sleeve in wrist or elbow length. Seersucker, chambrey, gingham, lawn, cashmere, flannelette, alpaca, brilliantine and percale are nice for this style.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

we done our utmost to help along this good work? It is so very easy for us to say that we appreciate and love Uncle Charlie—but remember, "words without deeds never to Heaven go!" Let's put our creed into our deed and not be guilty of paying our tribute to Uncle Charlie in that cheapest of coin—words, words, words! Don't let a day pass without trying to get a "sub," for, remember, it is only by the effort of every one of us that we can get that Home.

Best wishes to all, MINNIE BRUBAKER.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Now that the "in-laws" subject has come up, I'm just itchin' to tell you sisters how I'm tangled up with them. But just as long as I keep within the law I fear neither mother-in-law nor father-in-law and I have two of each.

You see my husband's parents are divorced and each have married again. Dad-in-law's second wife died and he has chosen a third. Hubby and I stood up with them to be married so you can see I get along nicely in that quarter. That made three mothers-in-law that I have had to meet, battle with and overcome. But I do think a daughter-in-law gets the worst of it most of the time; still there are times she is to blame, for any hard feelings, etc. For remember, sisters, you are taking mother's son away from her and she is inclined to be a bit jealous; wondering if you are cooking his meals as she has always cooked them, keeping his socks and clothes mended, or if you squander his hard-earned money, which she has taught him to save. She might even want to come and manage your home for you or tell you how to do it. Now it doesn't cost a penny to listen to advice or experiences, so if mother-in-law has some to give with each visit, just drink it all in and use it, if you see fit, or show her where you can improve upon one of her suggestions. You sisters would take to heart all your mother's advice, wouldn't you? Well, why not your mother-in-law's? Remember she has her son's welfare at heart, as your mother has yours.

And fathers-in-law, why they don't bother me a bit. Seems to me they just give a kiss and greeting and then settle down to their pipe and paper, saying to themselves, "let him paddle his own canoe, as I have had to paddle mine."

But if you sisters find visits going from bad to worse, just inform the "in-laws" in the nicest kind of way, that when you married your husband, you didn't marry the family. Learn to control your tongue and keep your opinions to yourself. It's an awful job sometimes, sisters, but it pays.

I have sifted this all out from personal experience and perhaps it will set a few sisters, who have the "in-law" trouble in either slight or severe cases, to think and act upon my simple remedy.

Here's good luck to one and all of COMFORT's readers. MRS. A. H. REYNOLDS.

MICHIGAN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have long been a reader of COMFORT but never thought I could help anyone so have been content to read the letters and say nothing.

But in the February COMFORT I found a case similar to mine and I am going to write and say to "Lonely One" that she doesn't need to fear. For six years I thought just the same as she does and most likely would think that way yet had not a friend asked why we did not have any children, as we were both very fond of them and she thought we should have a large family. Then I told her of the fears I had. I only wish that "Lonely One" could have someone talk to her as that true woman talked to me. She told me I would lose all fear and think only of the time when I would be so happy with my little baby, and she was right. In less than a year I gave birth to a fine little boy and two years later to a baby girl. They are both in school now and the house is lonely without them. I wish it were so we could care for more, then the house wouldn't be lonely very long.

So, "Lonely One" take heart, and let us know before long if there isn't a sweet little one to some day call you mother.

With very best wishes to COMFORT's staff and to the sisters, I remain, A COMFORT sister.

OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT most of the years since the days of Aunt Minerva and her Owls. It is one of the two papers in the home I remember when a child. The stories of frontier life on the Western plains, Ozark Hills and surroundings that I read at that impressionable age I did not forget. Now I sometimes wonder if that early reading did not have an influence on my later ambitions. From the early teens I've had an almost unconquerable desire to live in the West. Anything relating to that section of the country was more interesting to me than from any other place. I believe that many parents do not understand that a child's early impressions are clearest and deepest that their minds or lives are molded by what they see and hear while children.

I heard of a mother who had two sons that wanted to be sailors. As it was against her wishes she could not understand why they did. An educated friend asked to see the boys' sleeping-room. There on the wall was a large picture of a marine scene, showing a beautiful ship. The friend said, "You need look no further. That explains it."

I know a large family where more than half the children are teachers. I often wondered why, but when I saw their respect, almost reverence, for an aged uncle, who, as a teacher, had been held up as an ideal to them in their childhood, it was explained. It almost seems as if some of them will follow his example and teach fifty years.

I think many parents shape their children's future unconsciously. I have known several cases that make me sure of it. Our own family for instance. We lived in an excellent neighborhood and owned our farm. Our parents worked hard and managed to advantage, but we children were given the idea that farm life was drudgery. It was not that we did not like the work, but other lines of work were held up as being easier, more pleasant, better paid and more desirable. In our family of seven children not one farmer by choice!

In contrast to Georgie's opinion, I think country life is superior to city life for children. I do not mean the child of wealthy parents who is bought up scientifically and guarded by nurses, tutors and chaperons. I mean wherever children congregate on streets, alleys, etc., out of sight and hearing of parents. A country child's company is easier controlled. And why should the secrets of nature be "awful?" A child's mind can be made to see things in a natural way if his education is begun in time. Nothing gave our three-year-old son more delight than to watch and help care for hatching chicks. I answered his questions the best I could and in a way suited to his understanding. He has had seeds and examples of plant fertilization explained. What his father told him about the barnyard babies was, and is yet (even if he is older), as interesting to him and as innocent and matter-of-fact as the baby chicks he watched or the seeds he planted and watched grow, blossom and

PART II.

TAKING a moment to steady her leaping nerves, Diana went back to Mrs. Randall. She was relieved when people began to leave. At last the three were alone as they had been in the beginning—but with a difference. Diana had seen the ghost.

"Slip into a peignoir and join me in my boudoir," Hermione said when she and Diana had reached home. "We will have our dinner there. You look ill, Diana. Don't contract nerves on the brink of matrimony, child."

Dinner over, Hermione settled herself by the fire. "Now, Diana, out with it," she began.

But Diana professed not to know what her cousin meant.

"Oh, yes, you do, my dear," Mrs. Randall insisted.

"I am tired——"

"It isn't altogether that. Diana, do you love Gilbert Garth enough to be willing to spend the rest of your days with him?"

"Why, Cousin Hermione!" Diana cried. "Of course I care for Gilbert. But even if I didn't, I've promised, haven't I?"

"I should rather die than to see you unhappy as a result of your visit to me. If you find that you don't care enough—and you must be very certain, Diana—break with him at once and we will go to Palm Beach for the remainder of the season. For marriage without love," she added with conviction, "is a miniature hell."

"Thank you, Cousin Hermione," Diana responded bleakly. "I know you have my interest at heart. But now, if you will excuse me, I think I will go to bed."

In her room, Diana huddled over her fire but it neither warmed nor comforted her. She recalled Garth's face as he turned from his unbidden guest. She remembered Randall's look of friendliness as he piloted her out of the crush.

She began to be afraid. Had she been more analytical she would have discovered that, for Garth, she had only a negative admiration for his excellence which she had warmed into love at the freshly-kindled fires of youth.

Over and over, with that sinister tableau in Garth's hall in her mind, Diana fought with herself.

The woman, she told herself was one of the blackmailing hangers-on of the underworld who prey on rich men. To break with Garth because of what she had seen would be childish and unjust. Besides, she had promised. And to a Leigh, a promise was a solemn thing.

She finally crept into bed and lay with wide-open eyes far into the night.

Diana had a brilliant wedding on a bright morning of the new season. Andrew came up to give her away. Being a doctor, he could arrive only at the last moment, and Diana had no opportunity to see him alone till, home from the church she drew him aside from the high-spirited crowd.

"Di, I hope you're going to be happy," Andrew said fondly.

"But you doubt it?"

"Don't misunderstand your country brother. I'm dazed with all this glory."

"Do you like my husband, dear?" It was out at last.

"They are calling you, honey. This may be our last chance for a quiet word together. If life batters you too hard, girl, let me know. But don't give up too easily. Battering puts iron into character. Now it's good by, dear. Come down to brighten us up as often as you can."

As he bent to kiss her, tears welled into Diana's gold-flecked eyes. She went to her room to change, her spirits curiously depressed.

Felice served her so gently that Diana was touched and before leaving the room she laid her hot cheek against the maid's hand, closing her smarting eyes.

"You've been awfully good to me, Felice."

"But no! It is madame who is good. I would die for you," she added with fierce tenderness.

Randall was the last to wish Diana Godspeed before she ran, under fire of flowers, to the waiting car.

"It's absurd to anticipate the impossible, but if you should ever need the service of a friend, you can count on me to the last," he said, her hands in his.

"I shall remember. And thank you, Barry."

When, after a couple of months, the Garths returned to overlook the work on their new house, Diana's eyes were weary with life and dark with fatigue. From a gay and expansive girl she had developed into a reserved and mysterious woman.

Of no one did she make a confidant. Hermione tried to mother her, but Diana's indifference was chilling. Randall who had entirely abandoned the haunts of pleasure, watched, his face stern.

Almost at once they went to Westchester and Diana was grateful for the change. To be in the country among intimate, growing things, appealed to her new mood.

Randall's farm, The Shack, adjoined Garthmore. It was a modest place for, as wealth is measured, Randall was a poor man.

Randall was at the farm before the Garths came up to Garthmore to remain. He had developed a belated enthusiasm for a farming project which was forming in his active brain.

"I repeat what I said to you before our marriage," Garth said to Diana a few days after their arrival. "I don't like Randall and I will tolerate no intimacy between you and him."

Diana made no reply.

A few days later, Diana went to town, why she scarcely knew. Certainly the city with its hot, crowded streets did not lure her and none of her friends was in town.

Disinclined to shop and ennuied with the new house, she dismissed her car and strolled idly up the avenue and presently she turned into a side street.

As she walked eastward a woman claimed her attention. Something in the drooping shoulders and groping walk revived a smothered memory and, hastening her pace, she came abreast of her and, turning, looked her squarely in the face.

"Caroline!" she cried after a second's scrutiny. "Caroline Bart!"

The woman stopped and peered closely into Diana's face and Diana saw that her sight was impaired.

"Why, if it isn't—is it little Diana Leigh?"

"I never dreamed that you were in New York," cried Diana. Her glance swept the other's threadbare garments. "You are in trouble, Caroline. Take me where we can talk."

"I've a room near the elevated," Caroline replied. "Come with me if you like. What do you know about me?"

"Oh, very little. I always thought you and Andrew were in love, though I was pretty young to speculate about romance when you lived next to us."

By this time they had entered a narrow hall and were laboriously climbing steep stairs.

"Go on," the older woman commanded.

"And then I went away to school. The boys wrote me about your father's death and your giving up the place; they told me never to mention your name to Andrew. I never did. That's all I know, Caroline."

"Andrew and I quarreled about my coming to New York."

"But you came. And it hasn't treated you well. New York is like that. Could you tell me about it, Caroline?"

The woman hesitated and then, in the noise-shaken, impoverished room, she began to talk.

"You won't tell Andrew?" she said at last. "I could not bear that."

Her sight was too uncertain to detect Diana's pallor. The smothered memory was alert.

"Caroline," she asked abruptly; "did you go to—his rooms again?"

"Once—just last spring. I was crazed. I asked him to loan me some money. You see, I had ruined my eyesight embroidering for a shop and a specialist had just told me that, to save my sight, I must have a delicate operation. I could manage that in a charity hospital, but the year of idleness after it is a different matter. And so—I went to him. I thought perhaps he owed me that. And he told me to get out!"

Diana thought rapidly. It seemed incredible that Caroline had not read of her marriage until she remembered the weak eyes. She had had no eyesight to waste on the newspapers. Her ignorance made it easy for Diana.

She rose finally. "Have you anything here that you particularly care about?" she asked. "If you haven't, let's make a present of everything to the janitress. I am going to take you home with me right away. You shall have your operation and as long as you need to recover from it. I have married, Caroline, and my husband has a great deal of money. You need have no uneasiness on that score. Come."

Too weak and tired to protest much, Caroline gathered together her scanty clothing and by late afternoon she and Diana had reached Garthmore.

Having established Caroline in a comfortable suite, Diana went slowly down the stairs, her face white and thoughtful. She wondered if she had been hasty in bringing Caroline here; if, considering Garth's implacability, her impulse might not react against Caroline in the end.

She gave no sign of the uneasiness she felt as she and Caroline dined together in the latter's room. Garth had telephoned that he had been detained and for a brief respite, Diana was grateful.

Having seen Caroline tucked into bed Diana strolled down the stairs once more. She wished desperately to get Barry Randall's advice, and as the shadows lengthened and dusk finally fell, she threw a long cloak over her light gown and, gathering up her skirts, she flew across the fields to The Shack.

She espied Randall through a French window as she approached the house. In Norfolk jacket and knickerbockers, a black pipe in his mouth, he bent over his plans.

It was all so like her old home in the South that her throat swelled painfully.

As she crossed the threshold, three dogs rose to give her a drowsy welcome.

"Hello, Diana!" Randall rose hastily to greet her. "Where's Garth?"

"I am alone, Barry. I had to come to ask your advice. I seemed to wish to ask no one's else. You remember you promised to be my friend."

"And I'll prove that I am by taking you home instantly."

"No!" Rapidly she related her experiences of the day and when she had finished they stood facing each other, palpitant, yearning. She knew that his arms ached to hold her and almost she felt a slight injury that he did not obey the urge.

As they stood there, silent, Felice unceremoniously entered the room.

"Mr. Garth, he is arrive', madame, and is searching for you. I think he is on his way here by the lower path." She fled.

"You'd better hurry, Diana," Randall said easily. "I'll attend to your husband."

A half-hour later Garth found his wife sitting in a remote corner of the rose-garden. It was hot and he had hurried and his gorge rose at her coolness.

"Come to bed instantly," he began.

"Don't let me detain you," she answered, and her voice sounded like the whistle of a blade.

The next morning Garth had left for town before Diana was down. She had slept little and more than ever the course she had taken seemed unwise.

She knew that Randall would communicate with her as early as possible; indeed, he already had telephoned that he would be over so soon as the soil experts whom he had summoned should have left.

Caroline was resting in bed. Diana could settle herself to no occupation, but, nerves overwrought, she wandered from room to room of the big house.

Finally a telephone shrilled in the hall and she sprang to answer it. She listened, replying in startled, hushed monosyllables and when the conversation was finished, the receiver dropped from her nerveless hand and she clung to the table for support

In an instant she was galvanized into action. She ordered the racer to be brought around from the garage; she rang for Felice and told her to get her street clothes ready without delay; then she turned to the butler who was rubbing his hands nervously.

"Roberts Mr. Garth has been hurt in his car—how badly they do not know yet. Whether or not he can be brought home is uncertain, but get his rooms ready and have quarters prepared for the nurses. I'll call you up from town."

Into Felice's hands she placed Caroline and in twenty minutes she was racing toward town.

She felt like a frightened child when they took her to the room where her husband lay. He looked up as she entered—looked up and smiled. It was a softer, more spontaneous smile than she had ever before seen on his lips.

It was hard to believe that he was seriously injured for, except for his pallor, there were no signs. "Internal injuries," the surgeon who had spoken to Diana outside, had said.

"I'm glad for your sake, Diana, that I am not all messed up," were Garth's first words.

"Gilbert!" she cried.

"Don't you care," he comforted her; "I saved that little shaver."

He was not boasting; he was merely happy. "If I hadn't gone into that elevated pillar, I'd have done for him."

"It was splendid." She was on her knees at his side.

"It is a good thing to go out with at least one good deed to one's credit," he continued.

"Mr. Garth," protested the nurse, "the doctor——"

"Beat it, nurse," Garth interrupted. "I had nothing to say about my entrance to this life but I propose so far as possible to stage my exit. There are some things I must say to Mrs. Garth, so beat it."

Again that curious, transfiguring smile played over his face as the nurse, smiling in return, left the room.

"Diana, I am going to be brief, but there are some things I want you to know before I go. My parents died before I was three, and I was brought up by a great-aunt. My father had been a voluptuary and she was determined that I should have no inclination to follow in his footsteps. Until I was seventeen I had governesses and tutors—all of them ugly and scrawny-bosomed women.

"Of other children and my relations to them I knew —nothing. Great-aunt was afraid that boys would corrupt me and that girls would arouse in me a premature sex interest. I was selfish, tyrannical, emasculated before I was plunged into college."

"Dear, ought you to——"

"It doesn't hurt at all. Can you imagine the hell that college was to me? I was absolutely alone. In all the life about me I had no part. I thought at first that money could buy popularity, but I was mistaken. Those four years brought out all the cruelty in my nature."

"Don't think of it now; think of what you did for that poor boy today."

"The first good deed in over thirty years! No, not the first. It is that other one that I want to talk about Diana. There's a woman somewhere in New York whose name is Caroline Bart. I want you to find her and take care of her. One night, eight years ago, I took her to my rooms——"

"I know."

"I did the best I could for her. I liked her and I knew that she liked me and the knowledge seemed to warm my heart. I gave her champagne—she had been drenched to the skin. I didn't think; I had seen our girls drink quarts of it."

"Yes," Diana breathed, her eyes on his.

"It sent her to sleep, to dream, and in the morning she thought——"

"Yes——"

"Why, the girl had been as safe as my own sister would have been! Her accusations maddened me. It was one more disappointment added to an already long list. And so I let her believe that I had wronged her. It was devilish! I slipped a bank note into her coat pocket and sent her out into the streets thinking—that. It has been like an ugly scar all these years. Yet, when she came back to me, just before we were married, I spurned her again."

"I know, dear. Caroline is at Garthmore now. I will look after her."

Garth manifested no surprise. Perhaps he was too close to the solution of the Great Mystery to puzzle much over lesser ones.

"And now we come to you. I've been pitiless and hard, Diana."

She tried to deny it but he silenced her.

"I took advantage of your inexperience. I knew that you did not love me. You thought you must because everybody told you that I was a moral contrast to the others. I mistrusted that you really loved Randall. I know that he loves you."

Diana's face went into her hands.

"I've been out after him, but I haven't succeeded. Diana, he is a decent man."

The nurse thrust her head into the room, but Garth smiled her away.

"Life is a complex thing," he went on. "You can no more judge a man by one vice or one virtue than you can judge a symphony by the individual bars of its music. And I'm betting that the Great Judge knows that. He'll take the separate acts of a life and weigh them. By that method, I shall not enter the new existence cum laude, but I've saved a life and I've set Caroline Bart right at last. Those two things ought to help, eh, Diana?"

It was becoming more difficult for him to talk.

"You'll have sons," he went on; "teach them to—be big—by all the standards."

Diana was weeping and Garth placed a weakening hand on her bowed head.

"Thank you dear," he said. "And now, perhaps you'd better call the—nurse."

* * * * * * * * * * * * *

When it was all over they put Diana to bed and Hermione, in charge at Garthmore, sent for Andrew.

Caroline, radiant now, and with her eyes growing stronger as her health and happiness returned, was Diana's greatest comfort.

Barry Randall, gaunt and silent, haunted Garthmore. Nurses flitted through the halls. Now and then a specialist came up from the city.

Not until the autumnal haze dimmed the Weschester hills did youth assert itself and Diana begin to gain. Andrew had gone back South taking Caroline with him. They had been quietly married at Garthmore.

Diana lay on a chaise longue on a piazza one late September day; in her black frock she looked young, frail, and very lovely.

She turned expectantly as Randall's step sounded on the walk.

"This is good," she greeted, a thin hand outstretched. "Barry, I want to tell you what Gilbert told me the day he died."

Silently Randall drew a chair to her side. When Diana had finished he rose and walked to the end of the piazza.

"It is rather a tragic story, isn't it?" he asked, coming back. "And no one suspected that he suffered. At the last, though, it was rather splendid. He went out by a more heroic route than it is given for most of us to take. And he chose it deliberately. Gad! It was fine, Diana! He wrote finis to his book of life with a flourish. Isn't there something somewhere to the effect that he who loseth his life shall find it?"

Diana nodded, her eyes on the distant hills.

"By this time next year," she said, "I want Garthmore running as a vacation home for poor children. I am sure he would like that."

"Yes," Randall acquiesced, "I am certain Garth would like that—now. But you, Diana?" He came to her side and stood looking down at her.

"I should wish to be—near, to overlook it," she faltered.

"The Shack—could you be satisfied with its simplicity?"

The gold-flecked brown eyes met the gray ones and their souls rushed together.

"Draw up that table, please," she said when their composure had returned. "Together we will plan the Gilbert Garth Memorial."

He obeyed, his face transfigured.

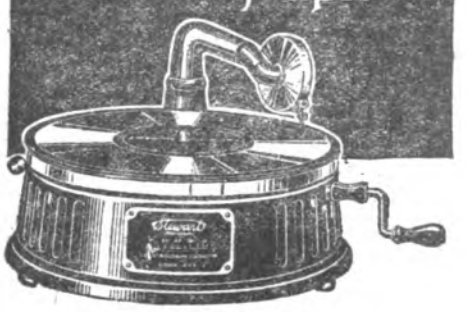
Pancho Villa

THE formal passing from the stage of Mexican affairs—for a time at least—of that picturesque figure, Pancho Villa, the bandit chief who rose in three short years from the position of a social outcast to the foremost rank in his country, practically military dictator, and who waged vigorous warfare against all who disputed his rule is a significant event in Mexican history. The last 4,000 men garrisoning the state or Chihuahua surrendered to representatives of Carranza at El Paso on the American side of the line, and it is said that the rebel chief has now with him but 400 men. Practically all the leaders who remain faithful to him have sought sanctuary on the soil of the United States. Villa himself, it was announced by the state department, would be allowed to enter our territory and permitted to remain here so long as he observed our laws. It is difficult to believe, however, that so restless a character as Villa will consent to remain aloof from the insurrectionary plots that are bound to crop up in Mexico, no matter how wisely Carranza may govern the country. Villa's trade is war and rapine. He has never had any other. He has tasted power, and the taste will be bitter in his mouth until he can raise the cup to his lips again. It will be strange indeed if, after the striking military successes he was able to obtain, he should be willing to accept the fact that his military career is ended.

For the present, it is true, Carranza is too strong, but later on when the inevitable legislation the new president undertakes has dissatisfied this class, it is more than probable that Villa will bob up again.

As a natural military genius his fate is of much interest to all soldiers. Some of his dispositions and conceptions in his early campaigns, when he could rely upon enthusiastic support from his troops, were strikingly original. He was a splendid commander of mounted infantry and knew well how to manage the Mexican cavalry to this end. He also turned the limited railways of Mexico to best advantage in his struggles with his opponents, but his chief claim to merit seems to have been his readiness to listen to advice from the trained military officers whom he constituted his staff and principal lieutenants.

Mexico is full of surprises, not one of the least of these is a glimpse into the home occupied by Villa when in power.



To enter a room that looked as if it might have been lifted from a French chateau and sat down in war-torn Mexico was very startling. It was all gold and palest blue satin, with long French mirrors, carpet of cream velvet, satin damask hangings in harmonious tones, graceful baskets of artificial flowers on gold pedestals, their handles tied with broad, blue ribbon bows, were conspicuous in the room.

But more conspicuous than the flowers, the joy and pride of every Mexican home at that time was a full length picture of the master of the house, General Francisco Villa.

TO INCREASE BIRTH RATE.—In order to promote large families, the government of Wurttenburg, Germany, has drafted a bill under which parents living in poor circumstances will be given financial aid from the state, after the birth of the fourth child.

RARE COLLECTION.—The Library of Congress at Washington now contains about 40,000 printed volumes of rare Chinese works. Among these are said to be the three largest books in the world. Some of the volumes listed were printed nearly 500 years ago.

K. knit plain; o. over; o. 2, over twice; n. narrow 2 stitches together; p. purl, meaning an inversion of stitches; sl. slip a stitch; tog. together; sl. and b., slip and bind; k. p. knit plain; stars and parenthesis indicate repetition.

Filet Crochet Yoke

(Rose Design)

THIS handsome yoke made of medium fine crochet cotton, No. 12 steel crochet hook, and crocheted closely will result in a yoke for 36- or 38-inch garment. Crocheted loosely of the same cotton, or if a coarser cotton is used, the result will be a yoke of larger size.

The work is begun in the center of the back and worked back and forth to the division shown in the diagram of the pattern. Here a chain is made from the end of the last row of the back, and the entire front is then worked after which chain across the opposite side, work the remaining half back and join to first row of work.

Then complete points on either side of the yoke.

Begin center back with ch. 52 sts.

1st row.—1 d. c. in 9th st. from hook, ch. 2, skip 2 sts., 1 d. c., 3 d. c. in next 3 sts., this makes 1 blk., ch. 2, 1 d. c., ch. 2, 7 d. c. in next 7 sts. (2 sps. and 2 blks.), 1 sp., 4 blks. (13 d. c.), 3 sps., ch. 6, turn.

If one is careful in making this first row, and in each succeeding row places the blks. and sps. over each other correctly, the pattern will come out right. Remember that a space is 2 d. c. with ch. 2 between and a blk. 2 d. c. with 2 d. c. instead of the ch. between. From this point each row will simply be given in blks. and sps.

4th row.—6 sps., 2 blks., 1 sp., 3 blks., 3 sps., ch. 9.

5th row.—1 d. c. in last d. c. in previous row. This makes the extra sp. shown on the neck or top of the 5th row of the diagram in the back. 15 more sps.

In making sps. over blks. always sk. 2 d. c., 1 d. c. on 3rd double. After making last d. c. in this row, turn, sl. st. over 1 sp., ch. 6. This shortens row 1 sp. and directions for doing so will not be given again.

6th row.—1 d. c. on 3rd double of 5th row, 3 more sps., 1 blk., 1 sp., 2 blks., 1 sp., 3 blks., 3 sps., ch. 6.

7th row.—3 sps., 4 blks., 2 sps., 1 blk., 5 sps., ch. 6.

8th row.—5 sps., 1 blk., 3 sps., 1 blk., 1 sp., 2 blks., 2 sps., ch. 9 to increase 1 sp. as in 5th row.

9th row.—2 more sps., or 3 in all, 3 blks., 4 sps., 1 blk., 5 sps., turn shorten 1 sp., as in 5th row.

10th row.—4 sps., 2 blks., 4 sps., 3 blks., 2 sps., ch. 9. Increase 1 sp.

11th row.—7 more sps., 2 blks., 6 sps. ch. 6.

12th row.—6 sps., 3 blks., 7 sps., ch. 9. Increase 1 sp.

13th row.—3 more sps., 4 blks., 2 sps., 1 blk., 5 sps., ch. 6.

14th row.—6 sps., 1 blk., 3 sps., 1 blk., 5 sps., ch. 9. Increase 1 sp.

15th row.—3 more sps., 2 blks., 3 sps., 1 blk., 7 sps. Decrease 1 sp.

16th row.—6 sps., 3 blks., 7 sps., ch. 9. Increase 1 sp.

This completes the rose. Now finish the front, working in the pattern to match the side just finished, but reversing the design as shown in the finished yoke.

After finishing the row which corresponds with the first row of the front, chain as before explained and finish the back, joining to the first row.

The points on either side can doubtless be copied from the diagram as it will make no material difference if one varies either the design or the shape somewhat.

Finish the neck by a beading of 2 treble crochet, ch. 3, 2 trebles in every other space. Outline bottom of the yoke by 1 double in the end of each row, ch. 2, 1 double. Add scallop of 9 d. c. and 3 picots under each ch. and finish neck in the same way.

Napkin Envelope

This handy article is especially designed as a case to keep sets of napkins together and fresh until needed.

NAPKIN ENVELOPE.

For this a soft mercerized cotton nearly as coarse as a darning cotton was used.

Begin with ch. 80, turn.

1st row.—1 s. c. in 11th st. from hook 2 s. c. in next 2 sts., ch. 6, sk. 5, 3 s. c. in next 3 sts., ch. 6, sk. 5, 3 s. c. in next 3 sts., repeat to end of row which should close with group 3 s. c., ch. 1, turn.

2nd row.—2 s. c. on 2 s. c., ch. 3, 1 s. c. under ch. 6, ch. 3, 1 s. c. in center of 3 s. c., ch. 3, 1 s. c. under ch. 6, ch. 3, repeat, ending row with 1 d. c. on s. c., ch. 4.

The manner of work should now be clear. Continue thus until one has a piece of work about 12 inches long, or twice the width of the work. Then work off to form the pointed flap, by completing one less figure in each row, as shown clearly in our illustration. Break thread. Fold pocket together, join thread to bottom of one side, ch. 5, 1 s. c. in opposite side, ch. 5, 1 s. c. in first side, repeat, when top of the side is reached, work 5 s. c. under end ch. of the flap, 1 picot, ch. 5, 1 p., repeat around the point, then work down the other side of the envelope joining the two sides with chains as explained.

MRS. A. O. L. WERTMAN.

Wing Edging

Ch. 16, thread over twice, pick up 5th st. of ch. from hook, taking up both loops of st., thread over and through 2, over and through 2, retaining 2 loops on hook.

* thread over twice and pick up next ch., over and through two, over and through two, over and through two more, repeat from * 5 times then thread over and through 8 loops on hook. Ch. 1, through 2 loops on hook.

WING EDGING.

This completes the solid wing. Ch. 5, 1 tr. c. in ring * ch. 1, 1 tr. c. in ring and repeat from * until there are 7 trebles. This forms open wing. The beading along the edge is now made; 1 d. c. in first ch. after the first wing made, 1 d. c. in next st., ch. 1, sk. 1, ch., 1 d. c. in each of 2 remaining chs., * ch. 3, turn, 1 d. c. in 2nd d. c., ch. 1, sk. 1, 1 d. c. in each of the 2 d. c. of previous row. Repeat from * twice, ch. 7, fasten between 2nd and 3rd treble of open or second wing, turn, ch. 4 and make solid wing same as before, follow with open wing and rows of beading.

MRS. H. B. ELLISON.

Fancy Work Hints

An easy way to commence a piece of filet crochet and have just the correct number of spaces is given by Mrs. M. F. Whitcanack as follows: Instead of making the usual long chain, ch. 7, turn and make 1 d. c. in the first st. of ch., ch. 5, 1 d. c. under ch. 7. ch. 5, 1 d. c. under ch. 5, repeat until completing number of squares needed, then ch. 5, 1 d. c. on d. c., ch. 2, 1 d. c., etc., as usual.

Tatting Book Notice

In response to the demand and for the benefit of our readers who are interested in tatting, we have issued a 16-page booklet of special designs by COMFORT workers.

This Tatting Book illustrates very plainly just how the work is to be done, by showing the various position of the worker's hands, which are accompanied by explicit directions for the different movements used in making the stitch.

It also contains a complete range of patterns, from the simplest edgings and insertions to handsome designs worked with one and two threads, including patterns for doilies, centerpieces, scarfs, lingerie, waists, yokes, collars, infants' and boudoir caps, bags, etc.

We will send a copy of this book free for one new yearly subscription at 25c or for renewal of your own subscription and ten cents extra 35c in all. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

mature. If children can confide in their parents and know their questions will be answered truthfully and not put off with a "wait till you are older," or be told an untruth, they won't be so apt to get together and see who knows most. Your son won't think it great to ask or tell the boys what information his father has truthfully given him. So will mother's daughter keep her modesty till mature years and self confidence will show the results.

I don't wonder Georgie didn't like country life as she described it. Also I think, in most cases, an older person's memory reverts to scenes of childhood.

As for schools, I'd rather have my boys get a rural school education and have liberty at home to use hammer, saw and nails and other tools, than to spend months wheedling at some object in a city training school. When old enough to choose their life's work there will be schools accessible, if necessary, to train for that.

With electric lights, heating plants, piped hot and cold water, bathrooms, well-equipped laundries, etc., why aren't country homes as desirable as city homes? And after half an hour in the bathroom why isn't "my John," after a day's work in cornfield or woods, as desirable a companion as the city man who has spent the day in artificially heated and lighted rooms amid surroundings or company not as desirable or enjoyable as the trees, brook and flowers, or horses, sheep and cattle. How many city men can take their little ones along when they go to work and have them in sight half a day as can the farmer who goes to plow and lets his little son and daughter enjoy the change and try to keep up with daddy with the soft earth under their little bare feet. This sounds awful, I suppose, to city ears, but I've seen it so often and the children were healthy and happy. "I was once a barefoot" child, fleet and strong, with health and rosy cheeks that were the envy of my friends. When I was eighteen years old I used to long to live in the town or city. Later when I spent some time there I was very homesick and longed for country scenes, and when I came to choose where my home would be it was the country. Have you guessed my work before marriage? Ten years a teacher of primary grades, and some years all grades in country schools. I saw the difference between children who were carefuly reared or those who "jus' growed."

Much has been said on Woman Suffrage. A short time ago I heard a young lady say, "I am a———." She knew nothing of party issues. It was just the "party that father belongs to is mine too." I think to vote intelligently, a person needs to read and hear everything important on all party issues, not to merely say they are on the side that has been handed down from father to son, as has been so much in the past. I don't think a mother has time for this. Her life is too full, or should be, of children and home. If women try to wrestle with problems that worry the men near election times, or all times, for that matter, what of baby problems then? A woman's greatest duty is motherhood—not only physical, but training in the best way till maturity. She has too many problems near the heart to say she can do more for the child by voting than by studying the child mind. Of course women could make as good, if not better, laws but to all good laws there is nearly always some drawback somewhere. Laws, no matter how good, won't give a child a true mother if she studies politics instead of "childology." There is a difference between "housekeepers" and "homekeepers."

I don't like to admit the equality of woman. I believe in her superiority. The woman who clamors for the ballot lowers herself in my estimation. I had rather be the mother of good men than make good laws. You say, "Why cannot I be both?" I say to do justice to one you can't to the other. Would women want to be soldiers in battle? I would not want to be another Joan of Arc, even if I have been made to believe that some of my ancestors were kin to her. As a nation we revere Frances Willard, yet it is said in her later years that she was heard to say she would give all the glory and honor of her work for a pair of baby arms, she could call her own, to encircle her neck. There is more real happiness and contentment in the life of a good wife and good mother than in all the public life of all the public women on earth. And a good woman's influence is greater if she exerts it rightly than if she voted twenty times. A true, honest woman does not need to vote to have her rights. I am "old-fashioned" enough (if that is the term to use) to think a woman's shrine is the heart of her husband instead of the ballot box and public office or publicity. I've heard enough disputing and wrangling by men over political questions to disgust me. Would not such make strife between husband and wife if they have different political views? My opinions do not always agree with the men folks on political questions that I have read about, but I think it does me more good to read latest ideas on child training, and let political questions go.

With best wishes to all COMFORT readers,

Fidelity.

SALISBURY, R. R. 6, N. CAR.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Here I am at the age of twenty the mother of a dear, little girl. My baby is seven months old. Perhaps some will say why did you marry so young? My husband is fifteen years my senior, and to me the dearest man on earth. We have been married most two years. Baby and husband shall be my subject in this letter of advice and request for information.

I began preparation for motherhood by reading all the good books and magazines on that subject I could get. When my baby was born I suffered but little. She was a bright little thing and I have tried to make her grow the brighter by caring for her in a scientific manner. She has never been sick an hour and it is no trouble for me to do my work. She is taken up only when it is necessary. She has her little crib and there she kicks and coos all day long. If she cries it is when she hurts herself, which rarely happens. My neighbors often remark, "What a good baby." I attribute it all to the manner in which I care for her. But there is much for me to learn and I read the sisters' letters with interest. I am afraid I might make some mistake and spoil baby and all I have succeeded in accomplishing. I would be only too glad to receive advice from G. H. of California, who has specialized in babies.

Every lover will not make a good husband nor does difference in age have so much to do with it every time. The man, who is broad minded enough to see two sides of a question, and who realizes woman is the weaker vessel and who tries to lighten her burdens, be she wife, mother, sister or sweetheart—that man has the material in him for a good companion. God blessed me with such a man and he is young because I am young. He feels that I should not settle down to a life of drudgery and loneliness. He says I should keep the roses in my cheeks for his and baby's sake. He is always more than anxious for me to go to places and we often take drives together. Or he will care for baby and I drive to some of the neighbors. Here is a point for young girls who read this. Is your lover a Christian young man, beside having the virtues I have mentioned? If so, fifteen years your senior doesn't amount to much. My husband is always talking to me of his class of young men in Sunday School and their devotion to him (their teacher) and the S. S. work. "His boys," as he calls them, share their secrets with him and seek his advice in lovers' troubles, and many other ways and affairs of their own. My husband says, "They have got to be good husbands and citizens.

Love to all the sisters. MRS. A. D. DAVIS.

JOPLIN, R. R. 5, Box 124, MO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

As it has not been very long since my last letter was published I hope I will be pardoned for asking admittance again.

I have read several replies to my letter on the divorce question which appeared in the October number.

Of course every sister has a right to her own opinion but I cannot endure to be called an infidel so must rise up and defend myself.

Miss Doble, I am not an infidel, neither do I profess to know the Bible by heart or to understand each and every verse therein and I do not believe there is anyone, no matter how good a Christian they may be, who can say they understand the Holy book through and through. And I want to ask you if you ever discovered that other place where it says: "When a man hath taken a wife and married her and it come to pass that she find no favor in his eyes—etc.," perhaps you will say, "Oh that's in the old book." It's the Bible isn't it?

Yes, I have read Matt. XX.9; but it's Matt. XIX. that says, "Whosoever shall put away his wife except it be for fornication and shall marry another committed adultery and whoso marrieth her which is put away doth commit adultery." I do not doubt a word of that and yet I cannot see where I have sinned as my second husband was not "put away" by any woman, and neither was I "put away" for "fornication." Instead it was I who put away my husband and I was justified in doing so by the laws here on earth as well as by the laws of God, according to Deut. XXIV. 1 2, 3, 4.

No indeed. I am not offended. Are we not asked to express our opinions?

Spring and Summer Hats and Some New Collars

This season's styles are such that any woman can trim her own hat fashionably and becomingly and make dainty collars that give a touch of elegance to her costume.

No. 4. Russian turban, with band of wide satin ribbon, folded in center with flat bow at back. Trimmed with straw ornament and stitches in heavy crochet silk.

So many different varieties of hats are worn this season that it is pretty safe to say that almost every sort of shape is in fashion. Sailor hats are prime favorites but these sailors are rather larger than they were last year and the brims often roll up on the edge a trifle. The very prettiest of these hats have brims bound with the same silk or satin or sometimes cotton crepe that forms the band as shown in illustration No. 1. This not only gives white or light colored straw a pretty touch of color, but it is also a great economy because it preserves the edge of the brim from cracking and chipping away as a straw hat so often does. Then there are attractive hats, both large and small with down-turning brims in the mushroom style. There are turbans and toques, small hats almost like sections of stove pipe with tiny brims. These are called Russian turbans. Boat-shaped hats and hats that look a good deal like a man's derby are also seen. These last are not very lovely to my mind, but the vast majority of hats are both pretty and sensible and best of all they are very easy to trim at home, for almost all garnitures are put on very flat and there are no outstanding bows or aggressive bunches of flowers to puzzle the home milliner.

One of the very prettiest of the brand new ideas in millinery is the ribbon covered hat as shown in cut No. 2. This lends itself to most delightful color schemes and makes it easy for any woman to get a hat in the colors most becoming to her complexion. In these hats the entire crown and upper part of the brim is covered with rows of narrow ribbon. The illustration shows one of the most attractive examples. This style of trimming is best adapted to the brim that is either perfectly straight or that turns down slightly. Suppose you wish your color combination to be black and the pretty shade of new blue that is now so popular. Then buy an ordinary black straw hat in either of the shapes just mentioned and a piece or two pieces, according to the size of the hat, of inch wide grosgrain ribbon in this pretty blue shade. Then starting in the center of the crown sew this round and round letting one edge lap a little over the one just beneath almost as if you were braiding a hat with straw. Do not full it but just hold it easy. When you get to the brim full the ribbon a little more than you did on the crown and let about an eighth af an inch of the last row extend beyond the edge of the brim. You now have a hat blue on the top with a becoming facing of black straw underneath. The further trimming of these ribbon hats is very slight. Sometimes a row of button moulds connected by a twist of silk cord bringing in the color of the straw brim is all that is used. Thus in our blue and black hat the crown could have straw braid put on in little button-shaped rolls as shown in the illustration. On young girls' hats of this sort often several colors are used at the same time. A very beautiful hat for a young girl of seventeen has ribbon of pale blue, pale rose and canary yellow put on in alternate rows with a brim of blue Milan straw showing underneath.

These ribbon-covered hats are suitable for young or young looking middle-aged women according to the colors used in the ribbon. A fresh-faced woman with iron-gray hair had a purple straw hat covered with black grosgrain ribbon and a tiny wreath of violets matching the color of the straw brim trimming the hat around the crown. The effect was beautiful against her silvery hair.

Another pretty hat that is to be worn a good deal this season is of Leghorn or Milan straw trimmed simply with a band of inch and one half or two-inch velvet ribbon, above which is placed a small wreath of mixed flowers. Sometimes the brims of such hats are left plain and sometimes they are flatly covered on the top with satin which is brought over the edge and forms a facing from one inch to two inches deep according to fancy underneath the brim, but many of this sort have the brim left plain. Very pretty and inexpensive spring and summer hats can be made by covering a light frame with colored linen, pongee or some of the attractive novelty cottons in crepy weaves. The hat can be entirely covered with the material or it can be faced with black in the form of silk, satin or velvet if this contrast is considered more becoming.

Then there is the high-crowned sailor with the narrow brim that some girls find so becoming as shown in illustration No. 3. A very simple and stylish way of trimming such hats is to face the brim top and bottom with fancy silk and put a wide band of the same material around the crown. The new fancy cotton crepes, khaki krill or even linen of a prettily contrasting shade from the hat can be so employed.

The Russian turban, as it is called, must by no means be forgotten. This is one of the most popular hats of the season, though it is rather misbranded for it is not a turban nor is it especially Russian. Perhaps it may have had in the beginning a far-away resemblance to some of their high caps. Often these turbans are brimless, but by far the prettiest have a tiny brim either straight or turning down a trifle as shown in illustration No. 4. Trimming such hats is a very easy matter. A band of ribbon will do it, or the crown can have two or three appliqued figures set on it, or it can be embroidered in flowers or conventional designs right on the straw. Then there are the flower-trimmed hats which are always with us every spring and summer. This year these are trimmed simply with a slender wreath of roses or mixed flowers, or flowers and fruit put around the crown just at the foot of a band of satin or velvet ribbon. Often on high-crowned hats the wreath of flowers or perhaps flat single flowers are sewed against the crown at the top of this band.

There never was a year when so many white collars were worn and as this is a very pretty and not at all extravagant fashion it is a pity that more women do not adopt it. It is especially becoming to young girls and young women though any woman, no matter what her age may be, always looks well in a low collar if she has a plump neck. The most fashionable shape of the new collar is some variety of the sailor. Such collars are made of organdie, plain net, sheer linen or pique, and very dressy ones for handsome frocks are often of white Georgette crepe or wash satin. Collar and cuffs of pique, linen, duck or organdie are made perfectly plain or embroidered. Such collars are often made with scalloped edges and a heavily embroidered conventional motif design in each corner, both front and back, with the cuffs finished in the same way. For linen suits or wash dresses the embroidery is done in colored mercerized cotton. One of the nicest things about these pretty collars is that they are very easy for any woman to make at home and often can be manufactured of bits of lace or net that one already has in the house and so be no expense at all. But before beginning to plan out the material it is best to get a pattern that fits one perfectly around the neck. You can buy such patterns, but it seems scarcely worth while spending the money, for any woman with even the slightest ingenuity can cut one herself from brown paper or even newspaper by just looking at the illustrations. By experimenting a few minutes she can get it just the shape she wants. It is best to fold the paper in the center and cut it double so when it is opened each side will be exactly alike. Then, when your pattern is perfect, all you have to do is to lay it on the material. If there are to be tucks around the collar allow extra width and length for them as shown in collar in illustration No. 3. The new collars are suitable for both young and middle-aged women, but as a rule the older women wear the smaller-sized sailor collars, leaving the big collars that hang away down the back to the young girls.

It is surprising how up-to-date one of these fresh pretty collars makes even an old frock appear, and they are so easy to launder, too, that there is no reason for not having almost every dress and blouse set off by such a dainty and pretty finish. Net and lace collars can be simply washed out and ironed without starch if desired, while the organdie and linen collars look better with a little starch. I always use a trifle of elastic starch which I can mix in warm water and use without boiling it. Boiled starch can of course be used if one prefers, but be careful not to get such collars too stiff as that spoils the appearance. They should be only about as stiff as new material so they will look fresh and crisp.

If you have not quite a big enough piece of net to make the sort of collar that you fancy see if you cannot find somewhere a piece of wide lace insertion. You can make the bottom of the collar of this and then edge the whole thing with narrow lace and the effect will be very pretty indeed and no one will realize that the insertion was put in to "piece out." Or if you have not any insertion perhaps you have a piece of wide edging lace not long enough to go all around the collar, but plenty to run twice across the back. A fashionable way to use this is to lay it selvage to selvage with a strip of the plain net an inch wide between and then trim the sides and front of the collar with a narrow edging lace. Or if desired the bottom strip of wide edging can have an inch strip of net run between it and the bottom of the collar and the narrow lace can be run all around. These collars are so inexpensive and so easy to make that there is no reason why any woman should not have several to wear with her spring and summer clothes. But when she makes them she must be sure to put all the trimming that she uses on very flat. Lace on these collars should never be fulled around the edge, but laid on like a band trimming and the corners should never be fulled but mitred flat to give the fashionable effect as shown in illustration No 5. A dainty effect is obtained by the use of net and lace, for collar and cuffs, as shown in illustration No. 1.

You are young and carefree and you certainly have lots to learn; just the same you wrote a beautiful letter and I admire you for your strong belief in God and I hope you will never have a trial of married life such as I had. Perhaps you will say: "That's all right, I'll know who I am going to marry." You may think you know, but you will not; not until after you are married will you know him as he is. Just suppose you were to marry a man and later, find, you could not endure him, even though you tried ever so hard. Could you, a young woman, go on and be a loving wife to him and live with him until death parted you? I mean of course, if you had just cause to dislike him. Then suppose he were to leave you and you had no means of support except by your own daily labor and you came to know another man and day by day as you watched him you could see so much good in him; things you had never seen in your husband to admire, then if he should ask you to come to him, let him share your trouble, help you to forget the past and start anew, that he could give you a good home and be a good husband to you, would you, knowing you loved him, refuse, and go on and live alone and work hard the rest of your life? What would become of you when you were old? Could you then say your life had been well spent?

I still say it's perfectly right to get a divorce and remarry, either man or woman if they have just cause and I am no infidel either.

Hoping I have not made my letter too long, I will close with best wishes to all, MRS. C. SMITH.

PUTNEY, W. VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

This is my first letter to COMFORT, although I have been a constant reader for eighteen years.

Mrs. Walter Alverson's query in the January number, in regard to the animosity that almost invariably exists between mothers-in-law and daughters-in-law embraces a subject that is the cause of as much misery perhaps, if not more, then any other one subject under the sun. Some not only succeed in making themselves miserable but the one whom they are both so anxious to make happy (?) is driven almost to desperation by the attitude his wife and his mother have taken toward each other. To sum up the causes, the mother generally doubts the ability of her son's wife to administer to his comforts, and make his home as pleasant as she had always made home for him. Then she begins to give her daughter-in-law advice and the benefit of her experience, which the daughter-in-law resents. Then too I have seen young wives insanely jealous of any display of affection from their husband toward his mother and vice versa. Therefore if each one would endeavor to overcome those selfish, jealous principles and the mother-in-law would remember that she was once a daughter-in-law, and the daughter-in-law would realize that in all probability she would be a mother-in-law in the years to come, I think the son and husband would soon cease to be a bone of contention for the mother-in-law and daughter-in-law to grumble and growl over.

Best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters,
MRS. COZBI BLOUNT.

Model D Johnson Carburetor

THE next carburetor entering into the discussion is the Johnson Model D, manufactured by the Johnson Bros., Detroit, Mich., and adopted as standard equipment on all four cylinder Reo pleasure cars and several other makes. In principle, it is somewhat a departure from most of the conventional types inasmuch that it incorporates no auxiliary air valves. One of its outstanding features is simplicity, it being very compact, easily cleaned and adjusted. The unique feature is the sliding sleeve which performs practically the same function as does the common auxiliary air valve except that it relies upon gravity rather than spring tension. As the speed of the motor increases the suction created by the pistons in the cylinders increases proportionately. When the suction becomes great enough the sleeve is drawn upward thus allowing air to come into the mixing chamber under the sleeve and prevent the gasoline-air mixture from becoming too rich at high engine speed. From the accompanying sketch it will be noted that the carburetor has two jackets, the inner one of which is cut away at the bottom. When the sleeve is in its normal position the inner jacket is securely closed making it necessary for the air to enter the mixing chamber at the small opening at the bottom of the strangle tube. As above explained, when the sleeve is caused to rise another opening is made for the admittance of air into the mixing chamber.

Should at any time the operator believe the carburetor to be in need of adjustment, he should first satisfy himself that each cylinder is developing high compression, the valve lifters not set too closely, and a hot spark is being delivered at each plug. Unlike a number of other makes of carburetors with the Johnson it is first necessary to make the high speed setting and then the low. Turn the needle valve, A, to the right or up until it contacts lightly with its seat. To make certain that the needle valve is fully shut off release the clamp screw that locks the indicator arm and turn the needle by the small lever at the bottom.

Next turn in the slow speed screw, B, until it is entirely closed thus leaving the carburetor entirely shut off. Turn the needle valve, A, to the left exactly one and one quarter turns and lock the indicator arm so that it stands at the center of the scale. Start the motor and allow it to run idle until the water in the radiator is at the normal running temperature. Next ascertain that the strangle tube control rod is not broken and that the control lever on the dash or steering column, as the case may be, is at the position marked "Run." With the spark lever advanced about one quarter of its total travel; snap the throttle lever open quickly and, if the motor does not miss or backfire, turn the indicator arm to the right, or toward "lean," one scale division at a time, repeating the quick opening of the throttle lever until the motor does backfire. Then turn the indicator arm to the left, or toward "Rich," one scale division at a time until the backfiring ceases. You have then obtained the intermediate and high speed setting.

The next step is to fully retard the spark and throttle levers and screw out the throttle lever stop screw until the speed of the motor with closed throttle is brought down as low as possible. If the motor does not operate smoothly on closed throttle turn the slow speed screw, B, to the left or out until it does. Make all adjustments as above advised with the choker wide open.

As previously stated, simplicity is one of the chief assets possessed by this make of carburetor. To clean the float chamber and nozzle the float chamber can be easily removed without disconnecting the instrument from the motor. First note the position of the needle valve and turn it lightly to its seat in order to determine what fraction of a turn it is open so that it may be replaced in the same position. Next remove the needle valve with packing nut and lock nut, after which the float chamber may be taken off for cleaning. To remove the inlet needle, first take out the pin on which the float actuates, remove the float and the needle will fall down. To remove the nozzle pass a large nail through the cross holes and use in the same manner as a wrench. To clean the nozzle, wipe out the central hole with a soft handkerchief passed over a match as it is of vital importance that this part of the instrument is clean and free from any obstruction. Before replacing hold the small end of the nozzle to the light to determine that the orifice and channel are clean. The nozzle is carefully calibrated to flow the correct amount of fuel and should not be injured or otherwise altered.

Selecting the New Car

The automobile industry has reached a stage where practically all cars manufactured are capable of smooth running, therefore the initial demonstration should not be given too much importance. However, as it is customary and about the only way a prospective buyer can get a line on the car it will be well for the reader to take note of the following suggestions. The salesman will no doubt demonstrate a car which has been carefully looked over daily by the shop mechanics and is therefore primed to do its best. If the car which is being demonstrated cannot meet your requirements do not accept excuses for its failure by statements to the effect that there is some minor detail out of adjustment and if fixed would improve the performance of the car wonderfully. If a salesman has the nerve to demonstrate a car which is not operating properly, he is deserving of losing the sale.

First select a course with which you are perfectly familiar, one which takes in a steep grade or two, a few rough places and finally a road which is very smooth. Before starting on the demonstrating take note whether all tires are fully inflated or soft and that the top is up. Soft tires tend to take the jar out of rough roads thereby reducing rattles which would otherwise show up. If the top is down the operation of a somewhat noisy car will seem quiet. When the steep grade is reached request the operator to leave the high gear engaged and run the car as slowly as possible without causing the motor to labor. Then ask him to gradually increase the speed. This will give some idea as to the pick up qualities of the car and the amount of power in reserve. Especially notice whether the car is hard riding when the rough places are reached. Compare the action of this car with others you have watched. When the smooth stretch is reached ask the operator to open the throttle wide and carefully watch the speedometer to determin the speed reached. Finally ask the demonstrator to stop the car in the shortest distance possible when operating at a speed of 25 miles per hour. You will then have a fair idea of the material which has been put into the car.

One Cause for Run-Down Battery

Corrosion on the storage battery terminals resists the flow of current from the generator thus resulting in the starving of the battery and many times damage to the generator. To insure against such an occurrence the owner should remove the battery cables, carefully clean the terminals and then smear lightly with vaseline. If you are experiencing electrical trouble investigate this condition at once.

Interesting Figures

Sometime ago an interesting article appeared in a Western newspaper concerning a unique record held by a farmer as a milk hauler. This farmer had hauled milk continually from April 18th, 1892, to October 6th, 1913, a period of 21½ years. During this time he hauled 4,244,762 pounds of milk, traveled 46,834 miles, and made 3,969 trips. One team was used most of the time, and he still has one of the original horses with which he started. This record reached the attention of a number of truck manufacturers who at once started to figure the saving which would have been possible had this farmer employed a motor truck as a carrier instead of the slow-going horse whose working capacity is limited. It was first determined that the cost of the man and team's time was worth $12,911.20, this of course including the cost of wagons, harness, upkeep, etc. It was then accurately figured that the same hauling could have been done over the same route at a cost of $4,542.35 thereby effecting a saving of approximately $8,368.85. These figures indicate the saving on milk haulage alone and do not take into consideration that the time saving would have permitted the farmer to do hauling for other persons in the spare time or put the vehicle to work on other jobs he might have on his own place.

Questions Answered

IGNITION TROUBLE.—My Ford touring car (1915 model) pops and miss-fires and does not give light. It has a new magneto. Several mechanics who have examined it have failed to locate the cause of the trouble. It pops worse running idle; will not speed up. Can you tell me the cause of it acting so?

MRS. M. G. S., Troy, N. C.

A.—In view of the meager details with which we have been furnished it is impossible for us to attempt to form a diagnosis of your trouble. It may be possible that the magneto plug is broken or that the new magnets were not properly installed. Our suggestion to you would be to have the job looked over at the nearest Ford service station. If they can't help you, write to the Ford Motor Co., Detroit, Mich.

FORD REAR AXLE.—Is it necessary to take the rear axle housing and differential apart in order to take the rear axle out of a Ford car, or can it be pulled out of the housing and differential the same as a full-floating rear axle? J. J., Stanley, Wis.

A.—The rear axle used for Ford cars is what is commonly referred to as the semi-floating type. If it is found necessary to remove an axle shaft the rear of the car must be jacked and the entire rear axle assembly taken out from under. The shaft cannot be pulled from the housing as can the axle shafts used in connection with a full floating rear axle. As it would require going to great length to describe each step which must be taken to remove the shaft, would suggest that you write the Ford people for a diagram of the rear axle. If you cannot decipher the diagram, you might consult the nearest automobile mechanic. Anyone acquainted with the semi-floating type of rear axle should be able to make clear any matter in which you might be in doubt.

NO. ONE SPARK PLUG FOULS.—No. one spark plug of my 1915 model Ford gets so dirty with cylinder oil that I have to clean it every few miles although I keep the oil as low as possible in the crank case. One cylinder will go dead for a while, then suddenly begin firing again. Can you tell me how to remedy the trouble? I. V., Standish, Mich.

A.—From all appearances oiling trouble in the first cylinder appears to be characteristic of this make of car. A very good mechanic with whom the writer is acquainted readily overcomes a trouble such as you relate by drilling three 3-16-inch holes equidistant in the lower piston ring groove. Such an arrangement forms a ready channel for the return of the oil to the crank case. From observation we note that this is becoming common practise on many higher priced cars. The experiment is at least worth a trial as it cannot possibly result in damage to the motor.

AUTO VARNISH, IGNITION, ETC.—What is the best way to apply a coat of auto varnish? The paint is good but the finish has been taken off by washing and polishing with oil. What kind of varnish is best for the purpose? (b) Would you advise the battery ignition system (spark produced by current from storage battery in place of magneto? (c) How long should a storage battery last? H. F., Gallipolis, Ohio.

A.—The first part of your letter was referred to the foreman of the paint department of one of the largest automobile factories in this country who advised that if the paint on the body of your automobile still retains a good color the best policy would be to carefully rub the present finish with a piece of soft felt that has been sprinkled with powdered pumice. When rubbing keep the body well wetted so as not to scratch into the finish. Next apply a coat of Stewart & Mowry rubbing varnish. When thoroughly set rub with pumice as above described. You can then apply a coat of Stewart & Mowry finish varnish leaving the job stand in a room free from dust until the varnish is thoroughly hardened. Regarding the use of battery ignition instead of magneto, we would not recommend the change unless it is your intention to install a generator connected with the engine to keep the storage battery fully charged. A magneto given the proper attention will give satisfactory service almost indefinitely. From this distance would advise that if your magneto is not at present affording satisfactory service that you return same to its maker with instructions to place it in perfect condition and return to you as soon as possible. Answering your third question (c); if you mean how long will a storage battery run before it requires recharging; that depends on how much it is used. At the most it will be extremely short and therefore believe that you can do no better than to have the present magneto placed in the best of condition and allow same to remain to furnish the ignition current.

Unfurling the big white fan lent her at the last moment by Lady Satterlee, she stood leaning unconcernedly against the doorway. It was a chilly place to wait, and presently she shivered.

Looking up, she saw Mr. Fairfax standing opposite her, regarding her with an indifferent glance, as though he had already forgotten who she was. It amused her, but she did not speak to him, as she had meant to do on first seeing him; it was scarcely worth while, either, since Satterlee would be back in a moment.

Just then she caught sight of the half-open door of a little room which had been carefully arranged by Lady Satterlee for her own special benefit. It looked warm, comfortable, inviting, and if she stood just within the doorway she could see her partner approach.

She walked slowly down the passage, and Fairfax looked after her.

The room was warm when she reached it, and she trailed her white gown across it to the fire, shivering a little. How long, how very long, Satterlee was! If he wanted her now, he could find her; she would not hang herself out into the passage to attract his attention if he had forgotten her.

With a sudden feeling of being very tired, she seated herself in one of two chairs standing by the fire. A few minutes elapsed; then she turned her pretty head to look impatiently at the door. The one lamp in the room was certainly getting dimmer; surely it could not be going out. As she stared at it the flame began to rise and fall spasmodically. Lady Satterlee had lighted it at five o'clock to see the full effect of her bower of bliss and lit it had been ever since, and as the last drops of oil burned it quietly expired.

Nerine rose with a little indignant stamp of her foot. "The lights are out, and the play is over!" she said grimly to the dull, red fire. "As for Lord Satterlee, he can find another partner—I am going!"

Tall, pale with indignation, she was the very image of Agatha as she turned to leave the room just as her missing partner entered it.

Congoleum Rug

Premium No. 7206

Given For A Club Of Six!

A YARD and a half long and one yard wide. Water cannot rot it, sun cannot fade it. It lies flat on the floor without nails, tacks or paste and positively will not curl up at the edges. The Congoleum Rug is something new. It is not oil-cloth or Linoleum or made of grass, fiber or fabric—it is not like any other floor covering in the world. It is absolutely waterproof, not affected by heat or cold, neither fades nor rots indoors or out. When you wash the floor or porch you can wash the Congoleum rug at the same time without taking it up. You can leave it outdoors the year round, and it will not rot, fade or get that dingy look that other rugs do after exposure to sun and wear. In doors you can use it on your bathroom, hall, pantry or kitchen floor, under the refrigerator or stove or in any room in the house. No matter where you place it it will outwear a dozen ordinary rugs and give years of service. These rugs come in many different designs and beautiful combinations of colors and we have selected the one illustrated herewith as the most suitable for all-round purposes. It will make an attractive appearance regardless of whether you use it as a porch rug, or in hall, kitchen, pantry or chamber. We are positive that every woman who secures one of these rugs will want more of them at once so we have arranged to supply you with as many as you may need upon the terms of the following

Your Feet and Mine

FEET are trying possessions, at times, as all of us know who have ever been bothered with corns or chilblains or bunions or callous spots or aching arches. Of course all these things come from our not having treated our feet properly—but that's no consolation, is it, girls?

One of the queer things which sometimes happens to feet is the growth of huge, horny nails, so thick no ordinary scissors can cut them. Very ugly they are, and often painful.

Do you want to know how such nails are produced? Well, quite often from wearing shoes too short. A friend of mine who had this trouble, recently purchased a new pair of shoes. Clerk after clerk tried to fit his foot, but did not succeed. Finally one of the head men came, looked over the foot carefully, then produced a pair which snugged in nicely at instep, but were much longer than the shoes my friend had been wearing.

RUB VASELINE BETWEEN OR ON THE TOES WHEN A CORN SEEMS TO BE COMING.

"But I've always worn sevens," said my friend.

"Yes," said the shoe man, "and they've always been too short for you!"

"But I don't have any trouble with my feet—except one corn."

"They're too short, just the same," said the shoe man.

And, later, when my friend went to a chiropodist to have his shrieking corn removed, she looked at his huge horny nails. "You've been wearing too short shoes," she said, and my friend, who had been complaining to high Heaven about those nails, subsided into a thoughtful silence.

He buys eights, now, every time!

If you have horny nails, buy a pair of nail clippers to keep them trimmed, and always soak them in warm soapy water to which a little tincture of benzoin has been added, before clipping. You can sometimes file them a little thinner, with the ordinary nail file carefully used. And at night you should annoint them with olive oil or vaseline, slightly warmed, and well rubbed in. Use, also, a polishing powder two or three times a week. You can use either very fine emery powder, or just oxide of tin, perfumed with a drop or two of oil of violets. A cut lemon rubbed over the nails every other day or so is also good. Let the juice dry on.

As to corns, of course the only way to do is to get them out "by the roots." Cutting or paring does not cure a corn. Yet I have known very mild corns kept painless for years by gentle rubbing from time to time with toilet pumice stone and nightly annointing with vaseline well massaged in.

When a corn has been taken out, your toe needs careful attention, for it is sensitive, and the first thing you know you will be having trouble again. Soak the foot at night in hot water—not for more than a minute or two—then rub in vaseline generously. In the daytime, before putting on your hose, barely soften the skin with vaseline.

Always take pains, after daily bathing, to rub the crevices between the toes thoroughly dry. Careless drying, and failure to rub away little cast-off flakes of skin, often cause cracked skin between the toes, corns, or other uncomfortable conditions.

In summer, vinegar added to your warm bath-water is good for perspiring or swollen feet. It cleanses and acts as an astringent. After bathing very thoroughly, then dust on the following powder:

For Moist Feet

Powdered alum, one half ounce; powdered orris root, one half ounce; powdered rice, two and one half ounces.

Answers to Questions

Happy.—If you are five feet and ten inches tall, you should weigh about one hundred and fifty pounds, but being only seventeen years old you would naturally not reach this full weight. Your weight of one hundred and twenty-five, however, is too little, and you should build yourself up. As to the "nettle rash" for which you have been treating with your physician, of course the thing to do is to obey his instructions. In the meantime, be very careful about your diet. Watch yourself carefully, and if you find any food does not agree with you, drop it at once. Drink eight to ten glasses of water a day (everybody should do this, ill or well), and see that the bowels move freely. To aid this latter, soak six prunes over night in a tumbler of water. Eat them in the morning, masticating thoroughly, and drink the juice. Eat spinach, onions, asparagus, celery and other vegetables. Take soups, drink milk, cut out rich desserts, gravies, and cut down on meat for a time to see how that works. Try drying your bread in the oven until it will break, then toasting it—it is really good! Chew every particle of food until it is liquid before swallowing. Be very careful about your lunch. A bowl of soup, some cereal and cream, with toast is a good lunch; or an egg chocolate, a baked apple and cream (though you may find the apple does not agree with you), some boiled rice. Perhaps you have been eating too much meat, and also fried foods, such as fried potatoes, fried meat, griddle cakes, etc. Cut all these out. Your meat, such as you eat, should be roasted or broiled. Fish will probably prove good for you, broiled or baked. Your potatoes should be baked or boiled until dry and mealy. Let me know how you get along. As to making the hair black, I cannot recommend that you try to dye it. This is rarely successful. Why do you want to change it? As a matter of fact, we all of us a.e given just the complexion which goes with our own particular hair, and when we dye the latter our faces are more than apt to look most peculiar. Then dye wears off, and also the hair grows, so that the new portion of hair is the old natural color instead of the dyed color, and it is almost impossible to make dyed hair look natural. Take good care of your hair as it is, wash it frequently, brush it daily, air it and sun it and keep it in perfect order, and it will grow in life and color.

A. P. R.—You do not tell me your age, so I cannot tell just how far under weight you are, but I am safe in saying most emphatically that seventy-six pounds is way, way below the proper weight for five feet four inches. You must set to work to gain. Drink plenty of milk, eat cream on everything you can, eat plenty of potatoes, rice, bread and butter but no biscuits, hot breads or griddle cakes). Don't eat fried foods or salt meats. A good breakfast for you would be an orange or some grapefruit, or melon or berries, or a baked apple or pear or even some apple sauce. Then a great big bowl of cereal with cream—oatmeal that has cooked in a double boiler at least an hour, a big dish of rice, or some of the prepared uncooked cereals, with cream and sugar. With this eat crisp buttered toast and two soft-boiled eggs. If you want something to drink with your meals, take milk or a cup of cocoa or chocolate. Drop tea and coffee for the present. For dinner eat baked, mashed or boiled potatoes—preferably baked—with plenty of butter, some baked or broiled meat (not pork or veal, but beef, lamb or mutton, or chicken or turkey or fish) and a green vegetable. And for dessert eat a baked apple or a custard or fresh berries or melon, or sliced orange or grapefruit, or corn-starch blanc mange with cream, but not pies, cakes or rich puddings. For lunch do not eat meat, but anything you want in the vegetable line or fruits. In cooking eggs, they must be soft cooked—not over three minutes, if boiled. See what I say to "Happy" about drinking water, and do the same. Also look after the bowels.

Blanche.—I am sorry it is against the rules of this department to answer letters by mail. I am not permitted to do so, because all of our readers are interested in every question and every answer, and the problem of one of our readers may be the problem of many. The exercise for reducing the bust is: Standing erect, with shoulders dropped and chest up, extend the arms in front on a level with the shoulder palms together. Now throw them violently backward, without dropping them below shoulder height, as if trying to make them meet in the back. Throw them forward again, till palms meet, and repeat fifteen or twenty times.

Any exercise for the arms is apt to be good for reducing a full bust or developing a thin one.

Miss T. S.—I am sorry that I do not know to what advertisement in COMFORT you refer. Look through recent issues, as probably the advertisement will be repeated.

Emma L.—The lotion for darkening hair, to which you refer, is as follows: Put an ounce of garden sage (new sage, dried) and an ounce of green tea, in an iron kettle, and pour over it a quart and a half of boiling water, rain-water if possible; simmer over a low flame until it has been reduced to one third its amount, then remove from fire and let stand in the kettle until next day at the same hour. Strain through cheese-cloth and put in stoppered bottles or jars. While simmering on the stove the kettle should be closely covered.

B. E. M.—Both blackheads and enlarged pores come from improper care of the skin, and probably the use of too much soap and hot water, with not enough attention to rinsing. Use a complexion brush (camel's hair) which you can buy at your druggist's or by mail, and scrub the face thoroughly each night with warm soapy water. Then rinse in warm water several times, finally in cool, and lastly in cold. In the morning do not use soap or hot water, but barely tepid water. During the day do not use more than tepid water, and no soap, and always end by dashing cold water on the skin. You can make up some "beauty bags" of cheese-cloth, two by three inches, half filled with rolled oats, and dip one of these lightly in the water to use as a washcloth. It will keep the skin soft, and cleanse it satisfactorily. The cold water will help to close the pores. Using hot water on the face of course opens the pores, and in time they become permanently enlarged; for this reason, always close them by dashing on cold water, but be sure, first, that they are entirely clean or you will have an obstinate case of blackheads.

Mrs. G. W. L.—Salicylic acid for moles is moistened with alcohol or glycerine and bound upon the mole for thirty minutes. The acid eats away the mole. After one application, wait two days, then apply again, and after another two days, apply for the third time. The mole will probably be disposed of by then. You cannot be too careful, however, in the treatment of moles, as they often produce dangerous sores. If I were you I should try the acid on a small mole and note carefully its condition after the first application. Your own good sense will tell you whether it is advisable to continue it.

"Hazel Eyes."—I am using this nom de plume for you, as it is against the rules of this department to answer inquiries by mail. (See answer to Blanche.) A good color for you to wear is the exact color of your eyes, or a golden brown. Almost any good warm brown will be becoming, but have it with as yellow a tone as possible. Orange is a good color for you, combined with other colors—any yellow should be good. You can wear olive green with slight touches of yellow or turquoise blue; or wine color with a slight accent of dark moss green. Mahogany will be becoming, and you can use small "notes" of old-rose or sage-green with this color. Soft fawn color is good for you, bronze brown, corn-yellow. Always remember that the exact color of eyes and hair is excellent and brings out their color, and that such color may be used in the trimming of a gown. For instance you could wear the fawn-color costume, with girdle, collar, hose, the color of eyes or hair. Do you see?

Peg.—To make the limbs larger—by which I suppose you mean the legs—practise the following exercises: With hands on hips, fingers pointing forward, thumbs back, throw chest up, put heels together, toes slightly pointed out. Now, keeping the back perfectly straight, begin to rise slowly on the toes until you are resting just on their tips; then gradually lower the heel to the floor again. Repeat fifteen or twenty times. The descent to the floor should be as gradual as you can make it, thus exercising the muscles in the calves of the legs.

Another Leg Exercise

Standing with heels together, stomach well held in, and chin up, clasp the footboard of a bed with both hands. Now lift the heels from the floor, and keeping them so, slowly squat, bending the knees but keeping the trunk of the body perfectly upright. Do not let the heels touch the floor, but when you have squatted until your body is almost if not quite resting on your heels, begin to rise again with only the aid of your hands, which are, of course, still clasped to the footboard, and of your toes. Breathe in as you rise, expel breath slowly as you squat. Repeat ten or more times.

Married.—The "little holes" in your face are probably nothing more than enlarged pores. Read my answer to "B. E. M.," and follow instructions. The "wrinkles" each side of the nose are sometimes caused by physical conditions—pain, etc. Look after your general bodily condition. Build yourself up in health and strength. See answer to "A. P. R." if you can gain in flesh, your wrinkles will probably fill out. It would be a good idea to massage the face nightly before retiring, using some good cold cream on your finger-tips. A particular movement likely to be of help in regard to these side-of-the-nose wrinkles is to put the finger-tips of each hand at the point of the chin, bring them up on cheek and toward ears with a sweeping movement—the whole palm of the hands will be on chin and cheek as the hands are moved up and back. This draws the skin away from nose and toward ears. Massage for two or three minutes in this way. A wrinkle lotion which may be applied, unless the skin is very dry, is as follows: Rose-water, three ounces; milk of almonds, three quarters ounce; powdered alum, one half dram. Put the alum in the rose-water until dissolved, and then stir in the almond milk a little at a time, keeping the liquid constantly in motion.

Mrs. F. S.—You can procure the lactic tablets of your druggist or by mail of any large drug house. If you expect to reduce successfully, you must also cut out fat-building foods. This means potatoes, rice, bread and butter, cream, milk, fat meats, gravies and sweet things. What can you eat, then? Oh, lot of things. You can eat all lean meats, fish, chicken, turkey, all green vegetables, such as string beans, spinach, asparagus, onions, peas, celery, lettuce, etc. And you can eat practically all fruits—except bananas. Take the juice of a half or whole lemon in a glass of cool water half an hour before breakfast every day. Eat grapefruit or oranges or pineapple, etc. for your breakfast, soft-boiled eggs, salt mackerel or other salt fish. For lunch eat green vegetables, fruits. For dinner, lean meats, vegetables and fruits. Also do not eat between meals, and do not drink at your meals. If you will eat only a moderate amount of these non-fat-building foods three times a day, I think you will not only stop gaining but will begin to reduce in weight at once.

A. M. R.—No, indeed, peroxide and ammonia will not make the air grow. The peroxide is a bleach and makes the hair lighter, while the ammonia dries up the roots in time. I do not know anything of the proprietary remedy to which you refer. Electrolysis is, of course, the surest and quickest way to kill hair, but one must be in or near a large city and go to a skilled operator. The peroxide and ammonia is harmless and, while slow, is effective. It takes quite a long time, however, with daily applications.

L. E. S.—I think this is the formula for gray hair, to which you refer:

To Darken Gray Hair

Pyrogallic acid, one quarter ounce; rectified spirits, one half ounce; hot distilled water, one and one half ounces.

Dissolve the acid in the water and when cool add the rectified spirits. When applying to the hair, use a soft brush and dip it in a small portion of the mixture to which twice the quantity of soft water has been added and a very little rectified spirits. Repeated applications must be made. My own advice about the use of any dyes by amateurs is—don't do it! It is hardly ever satisfactory—the dye adheres unevenly, wears off in patches, and the hair looks streaky and shows plainly that it has been colored artificially, while not looking attractive enough to excuse the effort. A lotion which can be used on the hair, and is not a dye, properly speaking, yet does gradually darken it, is as follows: Rust of iron, one dram; old ale, one pint; oil of rosemary, twelve drops. Put in a bottle, cork loosely and shake daily for twelve days, at intervals. After it has finally settled, pour off the clear portion, being careful not to let sediment run through also.

Mrs. H. S. A.—See answer to "Blanche." Your hair needs frequent shampooing, but first it must be heavily anointed with olive oil, gently rubbed in to the scalp. Tie up the head at night in a towel, and wash the next day with a liquid made by shaving a hand-size cake of Castile soap into a quart of boiling water over a flame, and letting it boil until thoroughly dissolved. Rinse time and time again. If any soap is left in the hair, it will clog up the skin and cause dandruff. Do not use a fine comb on the hair, nor a stiff brush. Massage the scalp gently every night by placing the fingers flat against the scalp and moving the scalp back and forward on the skull. Do not move the fingers back and forth, but hold them firm, pushing the skin which will carry the fingers along with it without altering their position. If I were you, I should rub some olive oil or vaseline into the scalp every two or three days, at night, being careful not to get it on the hair itself. This will soften the dandruff. It will of course make your hair look greasy, but you would better stand that for a while than run the risk of losing your hair. Wash the hair once in two weeks and dry in the sun. Take the hair down every night and braid very loosely, after shaking and airing it. And don't forget that your hair cannot be healthy if your whole body is not. If you are below weight, thin or pale, run down in any way your stomach or bowels out of order, your hair will suffer also. Keep the bowels open daily by drinking eight to ten glasses of water daily, and by eating fruits every day of your life—oranges, grapefruit, pineapple, berries, melons, apples, prunes, figs—as well as plenty of green vegetables. And exercise outdoors and indoors regularly.

Dickie.—You need to build yourself up a little to make your hair grow. See what I had to say to "A. M. R." and "Mrs. H. S. A." as to diet, etc. Get plenty of sleep—eight to nine hours every day of your life, with plenty of fresh air in your room, winter and summer. Do not put the oil on your scalp, as I advised Mrs. H. S. A., except just before your shampoo, say once in three weeks. Massage the scalp every night, just to stimulate the circulation and induce the little oil cells to do their work. And be careful about exercise, water, and the condition of the bowels.

Getting Your Money Out of The Bank

IF the bank rendered no other service to the community than to protect its valuables it would render a useful one; but it would be a mouse-trap proposition, you could only go one way; but the bank makes it easier to get money out than in, and in the outgoing process assumes risks and renders benefits too often lost sight of in the busy whirl of business.

We take many things for granted and live in a matter-of-fact age. We want our morning paper at the breakfast table with never a delay and with little thought of what it costs to collect, transmit, type, print and deliver the news. We want our train on the dot or we get impatient. We want our milk and our coal, blizzard, or no blizzard. We likewise expect the bank to do our business smoothly, efficiently, and without thought of the cost or the risks attending.

When your bank hands you a check book, it gives you license to draw as many checks, in as large or as small sums as you wish, with the only provision (except in certain cases where a minimum balance is required) that you do not overdraw, and promises to honor your checks as presented as long as your balance is sufficient to pay them.

Whether you want to pay your creditor in the next block, or a thousand miles away, the checking privilege of a bank account permits you to make your payment with ease, safety and despatch.

When you mail your check your trouble is over and the bank's has just begun, for the bank warrants to you three things, all for your own protection and at its own risk. It is well to know them.

It guarantees (a) That it will pay only the checks you have signed. If your name is forged and the bank pays the check, it cannot charge the amount to your account; (b) That it will pay only in the sum originally drawn. If some one gets your check and raises the amount, making it apparently a genuine check, the bank can only charge the amount in which you originally drew the check, unless it can show you were grossly careless in so drawing that you invited fraud. Therefore be careful to draw your checks properly; (c) To pay to the party to whom you ordered the amount paid and none other. If the check gets into the hands of strangers who forge the indorsement, so that the party to whom you ordered the money paid does not get it, the payment is at its risk, and you are harmless.

All this is ultimately for your good as a depositor. You know that your account cannot be drawn against except on your order. You know that the party you want to receive payment gets it. You get back the most perfect voucher known to the business world. Many a dispute has been settled and loss and law suit avoided by producing bank vouchers that told in no uncertain way that payment had been made according to the intent of the drawer. Therefore for your own good you ought to keep your money in a bank and draw it out by check.

The Doings of The Dapperlings

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1917, by Lena B. Ellingwood.
(All rights reserved.)

EXPLANATORY.—This story tells the strange things that happen to five-year-old Simmie-Sammie Smith and his sister Pittysing, nearly two years older, through the sly pranks of Nattie, the "Smallest Dapperling of All." The Dapperlings are kind-hearted, gay little elflike beings who ride on rabbits and never let themselves be seen by human eyes because of their belief that, if seen, it would bring some terrible calamity upon them. For this reason their queer little houses are always built into the hillside, and are so made, with doors and windows in front and grass growing on the backs, that they can be turned around to face out when the Dapperlings are by themselves; but as soon as anybody comes in sight the houses are whirled around so that only the grass-covered backs are seen and, as these look like the rest of the hill, you would never know the houses were there. They also have an underground assembly hall with an opening in the top covered with moss and concealed in a clump of thistles.

CHAPTER VII.

A MID-SUMMER ARBOR DAY

THE Dapperlings, each with a small, bright knife in hand, were cutting the grass on their hillside. It was slow work, for they knelt on the ground, and taking three or four grass-blades in one hand, cut them off close to the ground with their knives.

However, they didn't call it work. They just made play out of it, and called it fun, which, as you know, makes a great difference.

They always kept someone on guard, to let them know if any people were coming near. This time it was Pertwee. Nearly half the grass was cut, and they were thinking they would have it done by sunset, when Pertwee came running up and said, "The children are coming."

Then all the Dapperlings went into their houses, and the houses were turned around into the hill.

Pittysing and Simmie-Sammie were playing Arbor Day. They each had two tiny trees, which they had pulled up by the roots—two maples, one wild cherry, and one apple tree. Simmie-Sammie had the little fire shovel, and Pittysing a garden trowel.

"We'll set them out here on the hillside," said Pittysing. "The holes must be dug deep enough to hold all the roots. Won't it be fun to watch 'em grow? Our very own trees! Just think how big they'll be Simmie-Sammie, by the time you're a man. Perhaps you'll come here with your children some day and pick apples off this little apple tree, and while the children eat 'em, you'll tell how you and I set out these teeny mites o' trees, long, long ago!" Pittysing's eyes held a dreamy, faraway look.

"Tell a stowy 'bout it," asked Simmie-Sammie.

"Sometime," promised Pittysing, remembering what they had come to do, "but now we've got to dig holes for the trees, or there won't ever be any apples to pick."

Grasping the trowel, she went to work.

"This grass looks pretty funny to me," she said; "just's if somebody'd run a lawn-mower over it."

The Dapperlings, inside, were listening. And they didn't feel very happy. I tell you, it was a pretty serious thing to them—having holes dug right into their houses!

"Something's got to be done about it, and done quick!" Lulie Wye told the others. "Can't anybody think how to get those children away from there?"

Nobody seemed to. They just stood there, staring at each other.

Then they jumped, for Pittysing's trowel hit the roof of the house where they were talking, making a little hole. And some dirt fell through.

Lulie Wye covered her face with her hands, and sank down on the floor.

"Our beautiful village!" she moaned, "It will all be spoiled. Oh, me! Oh, my!"

"We may be killed if we stay here," old Shandle-Spinx said in despair. "To the assembly hall, if you would save your lives!"

Outside, they heard Pittysing saying, "It's too hard there. I struck a rock or something. I better find a softer place to dig."

Zipzang had been thinking hard.

"Leave it to me," he said. "Pertwee, you come with me. Skippywink and Todken too. "I have a plan."

"But you can't go out, can you?" asked Nattie.

"We'll push open the trap-door and get out that way." And off they ran.

Shandle-Spinx stood on a table under the trap-door in the assembly hall, and Zipzang climbed on his shoulders. He pushed the trap-door up a little way, just enough to climb through, and when he was outside held it open for Skippywink, Todken and Pertwee. Making their way carefully through the thistles, they scurried off into the woods straight to the rabbit corral.

"CATCH 'EM! CATCH 'EM!" PITTYSING SHOUTED.

"What's the idea?" gasped Skippywink, as they ran.

"Stampede rabbits—part of 'em!" Zipzang flung out. He was running too fast to say much.

"Rabbits! well—of all the—foolish, scatter-brained—"

"You'll see!" Zipzang told them. "Hurry!"

"How'll you—catch 'em again?"

"Come back—feeding time!"

Pittysing found a nice, soft place, lower down on the hill than any of the Dapperling houses. She dug a little hole, jammed the roots of the little cherry sprout into it, and patted down the dirt.

Simmie-Sammie was digging away, his round face red and sweaty.

"I don't give up for wocks!" he boasted. "I'm a-goin' to dig this one wight out."

So he tried.

But, oh, dear! it wasn't a rock he was digging into! It was a Dapperling house!

His shovel wasn't very strong, and the handle broke, which was a mercy, for in another minute, crash! would have gone Lulie Wye's best china cupboard, filled with all sorts of curious and dainty things.

"Well, you've done it now!" cried Pittysing. "Did you ask mamma if you could take that shovel?"

Then they both forgot that they were playing Arbor Day, forgot the trees, and even the broken shovel. For down the hill came running a slender gray rabbit—then another, and another—five, six of them—their long ears laid back, their round eyes bulging.

"Catch 'em! catch 'em!" Pittysing shouted. "Run, why don't you?"

Seeing the children, the rabbits half stopped, swerved, and ran toward the Mill Brook.

Pittysing's shabby sandals pattered off in a frantic attempt to catch up with them, and Simmie-Sammie came puffing along far behind, but doing his best.

Of course you don't need to be told who won the race. Rabbits can run faster any day than a seven-year-old girl. They were soon out of sight, springing over the Mill Brook and bounding along through the bushes, only to cross the brook again higher up, and go back to their corral.

Pittysing and Simmie-Sammie had to stop and rest a while, for they were out of breath, and their faces were pretty near purple after such a chase.

Then they went home to tell their mother and father about it, and coax their father to set a trap and catch a rabbit for a pet.

"Oh, how I would love one!" cried Pittysing, clasping her hands and skipping excitedly from one foot to the other. "We could build a little house for him in the dooryard, and we'd be so GOOD to him he couldn't help getting tame."

The next day was rainy, so the children stayed in the house; but the day after, their mother wanted the trowel to fix a flower bed, and they went to look for that and the broken shovel.

"I'm glad I didn't break that shovel," said Pittysing. "If you hadn't been trying to show off, Simmie-Sammie, you'd have found a soft spot to set your tree, and it wouldn't have been broken at all."

"Did I want to play Arbor Day?" demanded Simmie-Sammie. "No, I never! I wanted to catch that shiny little gween snake, an' take him home to show mamma, but you wouldn't! An' then he went an' slided himself under the stone wall, where I can't ever catch him. If you hadn't maked me play Arbor Day, I wouldn't bweaked the shovel—so it's all your fault."

When they crossed the brook and came to the pasture hillside, there wasn't any trowel there, nor any shovel, either. The children hunted around for some time, but had to go back home without them.

Their mother used the mixing spoon and butcher knife to fix her flower bed, and told them that if they carried things off again without asking, and lost them, they would have to pay for them out of their own money.

But the next time they went down to the Mill Brook, what do you think was the first thing they saw? The trowel, lying on the barrel-top table. And there, under the table, was the fire shovel, all mended, just as strong and nice as ever.

Shandle-Spinx had mended it, for he said, "It was too bad for their happy little game to be stopped, and I'm so glad they didn't spoil all our houses I shall at least mend the shovel for them."

You think Zipzang was a bright little Dapperling to save their village by stampeding the rabbits, don't you? Well, so do I.

The Dapperlings play a cute trick on the children while blueberrying. Read it in May COMFORT.

Churning by Dogs Under Fire

SO much that has been told about the war appeals to lovers of animals, more especially the dogs and horses, but the story told by a recent visitor to the war base is of much interest. Outside many cottages in northern France a wheel some six feet in diameter may be seen fixed into the wall, the purpose of which seems rather puzzling, even after one has seen a lurcher like dog enter it and in squirrel fashion set it continually revolving for about an hour. At the other end of the wheel's axle, inside the dwelling-room, a churn is fixed, which is filled with milk every morning, and always at the same moment the dog arrives, steps into the wheel, causes it to revolve its needful hour, steps out when the hour is ended, and goes his way to play like other dogs, leaving the family to enjoy the fruits of his labors when they return in the evening.

One morning, so the story goes, man began to show his intelligence by pouring a hail of shells on the village, stripping the roofs from the cottages or converting them into little mounds of ruins. The inhabitants fled precipitately, in too great terror to affix the churns to the wheels. But that made no difference to the dogs, nor did they consider that the shells concerned them at all. Punctually to their hour they stepped into the wheels and began to turn them. At a corner of the market place three such wheels were visible. A dog was in each of them when the action was at its height, and the houses were crumbling about the men who were endeavoring to defend them. But the brave dogs went on as though the hurly-burly were no concern of theirs. The fragments of a shell struck one of the wheels and all but put it out of action, a splinter of spoke acting as a brake against a wall. The dog stopped in amazement at so unexampled a circumstance, and then, seeing the other dogs still at work, set himself to overcome his difficulty and succeeded presently by a succession of bounds in making his cargo rotate uncertainly. A shrapnel bullet hit him while thus engaged, and he collapsed without a groan on the floor of his wheel. A few moments later one of the other houses was hit and the dog and wheel disappeared under the debris.

The third dog completed his churning, trotted out of his wheel and nothing more was seen of him.

Bulk or Package For Economy and Health

By Prof. H. Crawford Burgess

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

HOW many times we hear people—who do not know what they are talking about, nor give serious thought to the subject—say, "This high cost of living is all on account of paying for tins and paper boxes and fancy wrappers."

It is not my purpose to discuss the high cost of living in this brief article, but I will say that there is no truth in the claim that package goods have increased this cost. Economic conditions such as the cost of labor, machinery, transportation and many other things of that nature have, it is true, caused some increase in prices.

However, when it comes to the difference between bulk goods and package goods I can only say that there is a very, very little difference in the cost of them and that such increase in cost is more than ten times offset in one item alone—"clean living!" which means health to say nothing of the saving on doctor's bills.

I remember and some of my readers may also remember, when nearly everything came in bulk. Tom, Dick and Harry came into the store and reached into the cracker barrel and took one. What was the condition of his hand? What had he been handling? His hand brushed against other crackers. We carry more germs on our hands than anywhere else.

Now look at our crackers—in damp-proof, dust, dirt and germ proof packages—absolutely pure and sanitary.

Would you go back to the old bulk style?

You can get oatmeal in bulk a little cheaper than in the package, not much, but perhaps a penny cheaper on enough for twenty breakfasts. "Boy, bring in a sack of oatmeal!" And the boy does. He drags it across the storeroom floor and the grocery floor and the dust gets through the mesh of the sack and he dips the scoop into the sack up to his wrist—he's just been currying down the horse—and weighs out what you want. And you've saved almost a cent in a week.

Or you can have your breakfast cereal handed to you in a cardboard carton, lined with prepared paper through which no dirt or dust or liquid can percolate. It is absolutely clean and healthy and you are not taking a chance!

Will you have the man claw out several handsful of dried apples from a barrel, or will you have them in a neat clean package? Remember he has to claw into them in bulk with his nails. Not pretty talk, but think it over.

It is just such examples as these, and I would name them by the hundred, that explain what I mean when I say that package goods mean clean living.

You can buy a certain brand of "maple syrup" in bulk. It is a little cheaper than the good syrup that comes in bottles or tins with screw tops bearing the producer's name. But how about it? Are you sure of it? If you don't like it who's to blame? Not your grocer. He couldn't test everything. And there's another point in favor of package goods—the maker's name is on them. And you do not think a manufacturer is going to put out an inferior lot of goods and stick his name on it, do you? Certainly not. That isn't good business, and if it isn't good business it means a loss and our manufacturers are not in business for loss.

If by any chance you get inferior goods in package you take it back and your dealer will make it right and then your dealer will communicate with the manufacturer and say, "Look here, are you trying to spoil my business? A good customer of mine brought back this package I am sending you. Look it over and let me know if I may expect any more of that poor quality. If so I'll get another brand."

And the manufacturer will make good because he lives solely by such men as your alert provision dealer. If the dealer cannot satisfy his customers with one brand he'll get another. All these things happen and the result is that practically all of our standard goods, whether in tin cans, tin boxes, glass bottles, glass jars, crocks cardboard boxes or any other form of package, are so well known that we are absolutely sure of them.

"Send me over two packages of so-and-so's gelatine," you telephone. Why? Because you know all about it. If you ordered it by bulk you would say, "is it good?" and then you wouldn't be sure until you tried it. And when you've got your gelatine in the mould and trying to make it clear and harden and it won't, it's no time and in no condition to exchange.

Go into your own store—I take it for granted that you deal with reliable people—and pick out any of the package goods. Did you ever find any impurities, any dust, dirt or any foreign matter or any spoiled goods in boxes, bottles, cans and jars?

I don't believe you will find anything like that twice in a lifetime. Remember that in these days machinery takes the place of hands and fingers. Machinery mills the grain and rolls it and puts it in ovens to be cured and fills and seals the packages and no hands have touched it and no germs are in it. Besides, many kinds of food deteriorate rapidly and sooner or later spoil if exposed, as bulk goods are, to dampness, air and insect pests.

And when you come to think of it, this plan of putting goods up in packages that are germ proof is only following, or copying nature. The banana is in a germ-proof package, its skin. The shell of the nut is its germ proof package. The husks of the corn are germ proof, air and moisture proof. Why not, then be as careful as Mother Nature in putting up our food?

You may buy some goods in bulk and thereby save a few dollars in a whole year. And the chances are you may get some impurities, adulteration or disease germs in it that will make you ill and your doctor's bill and loss of time, to say nothing of your suffering, will be quite a heavy sacrifice for your attempted economy.

Where's the profit?

To sum it up, this question of bulk versus package, I would say that the package way is the clean way and the clean way is the health way and the health way is long life, true economy and real thrift.

Goods today cannot be distributed expeditiously, safely, cleanly and satisfactorily except in the package way. Do not allow anyone to tell you that the package way is not economical. It is the safest, surest, most comfortable and truly the sanest way to buy your goods.

Among Homes of Rich

Mrs. C. J. Walker, an Indianapolis negress, who has acquired enormous wealth through sale of an advertised preparation, has bought a $75,000 lot in the most exclusive section of Long Island.

The lot is opposite property formerly occupied by Helen Gould and close to a mansion owned by John D. Rockefeller. Mrs. Walker's income is said to be in the neighborhood of $200,000 a year.

The Newly Hatched Chick

THE coming year's success depends largely on the number of chicks which can be carried through from hatching time to the eighth week in vigorous health. It is the chick that grows in frame and vitality during these first weeks, that makes the heavy layer and the plump table bird later in life. It is estimated that not seventy-five per cent of the chickens hatched on the general farm live to be four weeks old, even when hens are being used to do the incubating and brooding, and not more than fifty per cent when incubators and brooders are being used, and it is due solely to the want of knowledge on the part of the person who has them in charge. Given a hundred chicks from eggs laid by healthy birds, and hatched in an incubator which has been properly operated, the losses should not exceed five per cent.

It must be understood that the first two weeks are the really critical time in a chick's life. If they get stunted or upset during that time no amount of care afterwards can counteract the damage done to their constitutions. Of course, the first consideration in caring for incubator chickens is the brooder. The continuous house, heated by hot water pipes and divided into small runs with a hover in each, is the one employed in large poultry plants, and is undoubtedly the best, but such a brooder house is expensive to erect, and not practical for a small poultry keeper. Next comes the outdoor colony brooder with two compartments, in one of which is a hover heated by a lamp. The outer, or exercise compartment is warmed only by the air from the hover compartment, and so, of course, is much cooler than the hover compartment, but still warm enough for baby chicks to play in during the coldest weather. Such brooders are complete in themselves, being thoroughly stormproof, and can be placed in any convenient sheltered place. They cost from nine to fifteen dollars.

Next in order comes what is known as the portable hover—a metal, drumlike affair, heated by a lamp, and which costs about six dollars, and is very convenient, because it can be used in any homemade coop.

Last of all comes the fireless brooder, several makes of which are now on the market, and range in price from two and a half to five dollars, but they can be made at home for about fifty cents each, when empty cases can be had from the grocery store, or a dollar if lumber has to be brought.

The first requisite is a box two feet square and seven inches deep, with a lid at least five inches deep. Or if you can get two strong boxes the same size, which are six or seven inches deep, take off the lids, and use one of the bottoms as a lid. Put two hinges at the back, and a hook and eye at the front. Cut a hole three inches square in the center of the front for the chicks to run in and out of. At both ends of the lid or top box, make half inch holes three inches apart and an inch from the top. Then make a frame to fit inside the box and rest on the cleats; cover it with burlap, and then cut a long strip of felt, flannel, old blanket, or any soft woolen material. It does not matter so much what it is so long as it is warm and woolly. It should be about four inches wide. Make cuts one inch apart the entire length, leaving about half an inch as a heading. Then stitch the fringed material to the burlap, commencing in the center of the frame and going round and round, the rows to be about an inch apart. At first, put the frame on to the cleats in the lower part of the brooder, with the fringed material hanging down, to make a comfortable covering for the chicks. After the babies are about two weeks old, the frame must be put on to the frame in the top part of the box, which will lift the ends of the material about three inches from the floor of the brooder.

At first, when the screen is in the lower part of the brooder, fold a piece of cotton batting and fit carefully over it, filling in the entire space to the edge of the box. In the top half, put a layer of excelsior about an inch and a half deep, then fill in with cotton batting to the edge. The burlap on the frame being porous, and the cotton batting ditto, allows a perfect system of ventilation from the front opening to the holes in the top part of the brooder. Of course, when the frame is moved to the top part of the brooder, some of the cotton batting has to be removed, but by that time the chicks have grown considerably, and furnish a great deal more animal heat than they did at first.

After the babies are about four weeks old, it is well to take out the frame with the fringed woolen material attached, and use another frame covered with burlap, which is to keep the cotton batting in place.

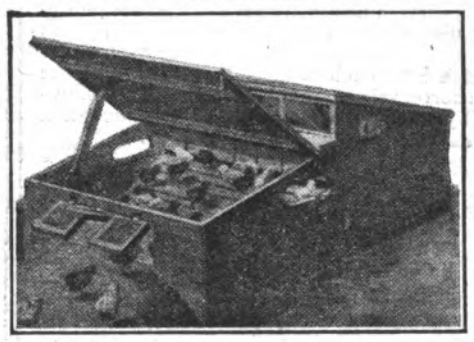
Before using the brooder, give it a coat of whitewash, and cover the floor with sweepings from the haymow, or finely cut hay, to make a warm carpet for the chicks to stand on. Of course, such brooders should be well housed in a light, dry place. A good coop can be made out of a piano box or large dry-goods box. A piano box can usually be got for about two dollars from any store that sells pianos, and will, with the addition of a couple of small windows and paint or roofing paper, make it water proof. It makes a good house in which to keep two or three such small brooders, or the same number of portable lamp heated hovers.

If the weather is still cold, the room or coop in which the fireless brooder is being used must be heated in some way, otherwise the chicks will become chilled when they run out to feed and take exercise which is necessary for their health. If the coop being used is an ordinary colony size, three by six, and not more than two and one half feet high, a good-sized lantern will heat it to about sixty degrees, which is the right temperature for little chicks to play in. Keep the floor of the coop covered to the depth of four or five inches with sweepings from the haymow, or finely chopped hay. Be careful that the material used is always clean and dry. Never under any circumstances use anything that is in the least mouldy or musty, for the spores which cause several deadly diseases are bred in mould.

If an outdoor brooder or portable hover is to be used, light the lamp and get the temperature under the hover up to 90 degrees with a moderate flame, at least a day before the chicks are to be put into it, so that you can be sure that the lamp is running evenly. A thermometer comes with all such brooders and hovers, so it is easy to regulate the heat. When chicks are put into the hover, the heat from their bodies will run up the temperature to 100—perhaps more—but don't alter the flame of the lamp. The chicks can push their heads out of the curtain which encloses the hover, and get cool air if they need it, so there is no danger of their being overheated if the lamp is properly adjusted to keep the empty hover at 90 degrees.

When the hatch is all over in the incubator, take out the trays, eggshells and any moisture pans which may have been used, and leave the chicks in the machine for twenty-four hours before moving them to the brooder. If the incubator has side ventilators, they can be opened to their full extent; if not, the door of their machine can be fixed so that there is the tiniest space for ventilation if the heat goes above 101. If the brooders have been used before, they should be disinfected as advised for incubators in last month's COMFORT.

Now, having the chicks housed, we must consider the feed and care for the tiny creatures. Always remember, in looking after chicks, that they are infants, and as sensitive to cold, neglect or improper feeding as a human baby. You know that when a baby is clean, warm and well fed, it will be contented and happy, but let anything go wrong with it, and it squirms and cries. Well, it is just the same with chicks. Go into a brooder house in the evening, when they are settled down for the night, and if everything is all right, they will be lying stretched out, and you will hear little twittering sounds of perfect content. If the brooder is not warm enough, or the day's food has contained anything irritating, they will be standing up, huddled together, and uttering sharp little sounds, which are unmistakable cries of trouble. Cultivate the habit of noticing such signs, and be guided by them, for a happy chick is a healthy chick, and a healthy chick makes a profitable bird.



Chicks must have nothing to eat for the first thirty-six hours, for just before they break their shell, the remaining part of the yolk is drawn into the chick's body, and must have time to digest and be assimilated before any other food is introduced, or the digestive organs will be overtaxed, and bowel trouble is likely to result.

If chicks are put into a compartment brooder, shut the small door which communicates with the outer compartment, and keep them confined to the compartment where the hover is, for the first two days. If the portable hover is being used, stand it in a box, or make a screen of cardboard or fine mesh wire, about three inches wider all round the hover, so that the chicks can come from under the curtain and have that small space to play in, yet not be able to wander off into cold corners, as they are apt to do before they have learned to accept the hover as home.

With the fireless box hover, make some sort of a small enclosure in front of the opening, and gently shoo them back into the box every hour or so, for there is no warmth to attract them to this kind of a hover, and it is wise to do some little teaching of this sort, even with a heated hover, especially at bedtime, for there is always danger of some foolish little fellows getting sleepy, and forgetting which way they ought to go.

The fireless brooder of the dimensions given will accommodate fifty chicks for two weeks, and twenty-five after that age. But remember that it takes at least twenty-five chickens the first week to make such a "mother" warm enough to keep them comfortable as it depends entirely upon the animal heat from their bodies.

As soon as they are placed in a brooder, scatter some fine gravel or very finely cracked poultry grit. I like the gravel that is sold for caged birds for the first two or three days, as it is bright, and attracts the little fellows to pick it up, and in ths way they get the material that is needed to enable the gizzard to grind feed when it is given to them. After the thirty-six hours' fast, put a small pan of sour skim-milk before them, and, to teach them how to feed, pick up one or two and dip their bills into the milk. If a few commence to eat, the others will follow suit. Of course the milk, like the water that is given to chickens, must be in dishes that are partly covered to prevent them getting into it. For the sour milk, we use small fruit saucers, with a strip of board put across the top, so that there is only a small opening left on each side of the dish.

At the end of half an hour, the milk is taken away, and two hours later they have their first real food, which consists of stale bread which has been dried in the oven and put through a meat chopper. One cup of this is mixed with two eggs which have been boiled hard, cooled, and chopped, shell and all. About one third of the mixture is poured along a narrow board and given to fifty chicks. If any is left at the end of half an hour, it is removed. The following day, sour milk and the above mash is alternated at intervals of two hours. After that, the sour milk is left before them all the time, the mash given in small quantities every two hours.

On the fourth day they have water given them for the first time. The fountain is left in the coop for half an hour in the morning, and the same length of time at about 2 p. m., and a little rolled oats, which has been broken fine, is scattered on the floor of the coop.

The fifth and sixth days are the same as the fourth, except that the dish of water is left before them all the time. After the sixth day we commence to use rolled oats instead of the dry bread in the mash, and liver or lean meat which has been parboiled, gradually takes the place of the egg, and chick feed is scattered on floor three times a day. All these changes must be accomplished very gradually from the sixth to the twenty-eighth day, and, of course, the quantity given must be increased, for chicks are very fast growers. In fact, there is no young creature, except squabs, that grows so rapidly during the first two weeks of its life, as a chicken, and for this reason, chicks require an abundance of easily digested, nutritious food, and to keep the digestive system in proper working order, it must be supplied in small quantities very frequently.

After the fourth day, never leave mash before them more than fifteen minutes at a time, and don't make more than is needed for one day at a time, or it may sour and cause trouble; besides which, if it is left before them all the time, they will have no inducement to scratch and hunt for the chick feed.

From the fourth to the eighth week, we keep a dry mash before them all the time in self-feeding hoppers, for they will not eat this as greedily as they do the soft mash. Give them all the fresh green stuff they will eat at noon. Young Alfalfa and clover leaves are good. If you have neither, use the green sprouts of oats.

The dry mash is the same as that used at the New Jersey Experiment Station, and is composed of the following grains:

Wheat bran, 50 pounds; gluten feed, 10 pounds; corn-meal, 10 pounds; ground oats, 10 pounds, meat scraps, 10 pounds; dry ground bone, 10 pounds.

The Great Value of Skim-Milk

I wish to call special attention to the value of sour skim-milk in baby chick feeding. Sour milk is very palatable; it also contains much food value in its casein, which is a form of protein or nitrogen. The greatest benefit, however, lies in its disinfecting qualities. The lactic acid present kills and prevents the multiplication of intestinal bacteria. White diarrhea is one of the most dangerous of these forms. In order to get the greatest benefit from sour skim-milk it should be given the youngsters to drink from the very first day, being given in a closed vacuum fountain, so that the chicks cannot get their feathers soiled with it. It should be changed daily and the vessel kept perfectly clean. Experiments conducted at the Connecticut Experiment Station have proven its great value. Experiments conducted at the New Jersey Station show that where sour milk is used as mentioned, the percentage of mortality was very materially reduced over pens that did not receive it. Also the skim-milk chicks made a gain in weight of over 28 per cent more than those receiving no milk. Since these conclusive tests it is needless to say that we are feeding skim-milk (sour) to all of our young chicks during the brooding period with the greatest success.

Wheat Bran a Valuable Chick Feed

Wheat bran is a valuable adjunct to the chick ration. It is especially palatable and rich in protein. It has a high ash content (phosphoric acid) and is fairly bulky, which makes it useful to mix with finer and more concentrated feeds. Wheat bran aids digestion through the presence of a ferment "diastase" which it contains, and is mildly laxative.

Provide Plenty of Ash for Bone

The chick during its early growth makes bone rapidly; for this reason plenty of ash must be provided. Extensive experiments show the great value of bone in ration. Dry granulated bone contains about twenty-five per cent of phosphoric acid, and about the same amount of protein, and can be secured by the hundred pounds for a little over two dollars.

The same series of experiments showed conclusively the great need of animal material in the ration for growing chicks. Flocks fed moderate quantities of meat scrap made by far the greatest and fastest gains, and were much healthier than flocks from which all animal material was withheld. The food nutrients from animal sources seem in practise to be more readily available than the same nutrients from vegetable sources. Large quantities of meat or concentrated animal protein feeds should not be fed, especially early in the brooding period, as the forcing which results is apt to cause a relatively high mortality.

Plenty of green feed in the form of lettuce leaves, sprouted oat tops, green clover or Alfalfa, must be supplied. Such material is termed succulence, carrying as it does, a high water content. It adds to the palatability of the ration, making it more digestible and keeping the chicks hungry and healthy.

G. G. S.—There are two varieties of Muscovy ducks. The colored ones are glossy black and white; the head and neck slightly more black than white. The back, breast and body, lustrous blue black, sometimes broken by a few white feathers. The face red and crinkled, like a turkey's neck. The White Muscovy is all white, with the same kind of red face. They are handsome birds; weigh about ten pounds when full grown, but not so good for egg production or table use as the Indian Runners and Pekins. Their habits are the same as those of other ducks.

A. W. S.—Raising only twenty-five chickens from three hundred is indeed dreadful. I am inclined to think that instead of pip, the chickens had brooder pneumonia, and that the dry, hard tongue was caused by the feverish breath passing over it. The spores which cause this disease are sometimes present in the egg before it is hatched. Eggs that have been laid in dirty nests or in mouldy material become contaminated through the shell. Incubators and brooders which have been put away at the end of the season without being thoroughly cleansed, or which have been stored in a damp place, are likely to be infested with aspergillus fungii, the spores of which are inhaled by the chicks, and may affect the eggs in an incubator. Always disinfect incubators and brooders after each hatch. (See March number of COMFORT.) Doctoring is of no value if the disease once develops. The only course is to prevent an outbreak, by cleaning, scrubbing and disinfecting everything, and being extremely careful that the hay sweepings, or whatever is used for bedding on the floor of the brooder, is perfectly sweet and free from mould and dust. If the young turkeys are with turkey hens, give them nothing but sour milk, as they will pick up plenty of food for themselves on range. If they are with common hens, apply the methods recommended this month for the first week of a chicken's life, only give nothing but sour milk for three days.

M. P.—I am glad to be considered a friend by our COMFORT readers, and to help them with their poultry problems whenever I can. Personally, I prefer White Wyandottes, and think them the best general purpose fowl. But if you prefer colored birds, Rhode Island Reds or Plymouth Rocks are equally good layers and table birds. Better get the two settings of eggs from different breeders, and use the cockerels from one setting to mate with the pullets from the other, and the following year mate the old roosters with their daughters, and the young cockerels to the old hens.

J. M. T.—Possibly the chicken-house is draughty, and the chickens get cold in their eyes when on the roost. As all colds are likely to develop into roup, which is contagious, you should separate the sick birds from the rest of the flock, and shut them up in a separate coop. Clean and disinfect the chicken-house and everything in it. Dissolve one teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in a quart of water, and for use dilute one tablespoonful with three of water. Bathe the sick bird's head, face and eyes with it twice a day. Feed lightly on nourishing food. Stale bread soaked in milk and squeezed dry is good.

O. S. F.—All imported drugs have gone up so much in prices during the last year, that I advise you to depend on ordinary sour milk. To hasten the souring process, we use liquid rennet.

L. H. R.—The turkey is suffering from pip. The hard scales can be pulled off if the point of a wooden skewer or some such instrument is used. After it is removed, rub the tongue twice a day with a mixture of honey and borax. Repeat three or four days, and feed soft food. Administer a dose of Epsom salts two mornings in succession. About twenty-five grains will be right for a full-grown turkey. Also read answer to A. W. S.

H. H.—Young turkeys must not be allowed to run on the ground where other poultry is in the habit of congregating, and they must be free from lice and mites. When common hens are doing the hatching, it is well to put them on china eggs in a small coop, take them off the nest every night, and dust them thoroughly with insect powder. After three or four good treatments they can be removed to another clean coop, and given the turkey eggs. Powder them thoroughly once every week while they are sitting and brooding. Read latter part of the answer to A. W. S.

M. Y. S.—As you are sure the original brood of turkeys were not related, you can use the young gobbler this year. I don't like to use turkeys for breeding that are less than a year old. Turkeys commence to lay as soon as the weather gets warm in the spring, lay a clutch of eggs and then get broody just as a common hen does. If they are not allowed to set, they will commence to lay again in two or three weeks, but they seldom lay as many eggs in the second clutch. I can't account for the soft-shelled eggs, unless the bird was old or out of condition. The young turkeys dying in the shell might have meant want of vitality, or an old hen leaving her nest just at hatching time. I like well-matured birds for breeders. We have one White Holland turkey who is eight years old. She laid forty-seven eggs last year, all of which hatched. A gobbler may be useful for ten years, but I never keep one after the fifth year. If gobblers and hens are on free range, there should be about ten hens to one gobbler. If, however, the gobbler is kept in a yard during the breeding season, a fresh hen can be turned in to him every morning, and in this way you can mate twenty or thirty hens to a gobbler. Read the poultry department in the February and March numbers of COMFORT. It would help you about incubator chicks dying in the shell.

L. M. W.—Your objection to the non-freezing water fountain, which I described in one of the early winter issues of COMFORT, has not been met by us, but we fill up the drinking vessels with warm water three times a day during cold weather.

F. F.—There are many reasons for feeding mash in the morning and whole corn at night. First, mash is more quickly digested, and sustains the nervous system of the bird during the hours when they are taking active exercise. Second; birds should never have more than half a feed of such concentrated material as ground corn, or they will become too fat, and at night they want a full feed. If this is moist mash, it becomes cold in the crop, and the birds are uncomfortable during the night. Whole corn, on the other hand, generates heat. We always mix a little small grain, such as wheat, Kafir corn or oats, with the corn which is fed broadcast on the litter in the poultry house. The corn being large, is picked up at once, and the birds go to roost with a full crop, and are kept comfortable all night, and when they get up in the morning, there is something to scratch for, which insures them taking active exercise that will set the blood in curculation and tone them up for the whole day.

N. B.—I was very much interested in reading your letter, but unfortunately the want of space will prevent our publishing it.

dens on to somebody else and that someone else is usualy trying to do the very same thing we are trying to do. If the whip of necessity didn't lash humanity into action most humans would lie down and die of indolence. Environment has a great deal to do with the individual and national character. Take the Scotch and Irish for instance. They are as the poles apart. The Scotch have to hustle like the deuce to get a living out of their rocky and barren soil, and they have a climate that is inclined to be rigorous, a climate that keeps them alert and active. The Irishman has a rich soil and plenty of warmth and moisture. He can smoke his pipe while the soil works for him. He has plenty of time to play and dream while the Scotchman hasn't. The Irish climate is conducive to emotion rather than motion. Unless motion and emotion are nicely balanced there is bound to be abnormal results. Thus it is that the Irishman is a little too emotional and the Scotchman not emotional enough. Buckle in his History of Civilization discusses this matter very interestingly. If you don't want to take music lessons Dorothy, for heaven's sake cut music out. The tasks we have to be driven to do should never be forced upon us, not in childhood at least. Only children who love music should be taught music. We have to suffer enough agony in this world without being forced to listen to the hideous racket fond parents force their unmusical children to spring on poor, unsuspecting visitors who are compelled to listen while Mary Jane or John Henry stumble over their one and only half memorized piece, and oh, what an awful piece it usually is! Dorothy, remember the work of the world has to be done by somebody, and you have positively got to do your share. Some day when we get civilized everyone will have his allotted task to do and he will have to do it. Those who won't work will have to starve, for the charity that keeps the poor contented and the lazy alive, has been a curse all through the ages, and it is a curse of which we shall rid ourselves as soon as justice dawns on the earth. Until that day comes Dorothy I will arrange with Billy the Goat to supply you with some energizing pills, the chief ingredients of which are ambition, hard work, efficiency and stick-at-iveness. Take one of these pills every hour twice a day in water and see the water is not over your head, for its dangerous for lazy people to get into deep water.

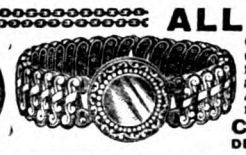
GOLCONDA, ILL.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have been a reader of COMFORT and also a member of the "League of Cousins" for several years. Although I know I have been a very unworthy cousin, I do certainly enjoy your editorials and replies. It seems to me almost impossible for a person afflicted as you are to hold onto your fun and humor and do such a noble work as you are doing. I am well and strong but it doesn't take much pain and sorrow to drive away my sunny disposition. I am a farmer and a farmer's son. Have lived here on a bluff overlooking the Ohio river all my life almost. It is a grand view, but rather an inconvenient place to get at.

I would rather farm than anything else, for I like farming. I have farmed in Missouri and now my father has purchased an island fifteen miles below Cario which I intend to farm. I have dark hair and eyes, am five feet eight inches short, weigh one hundred and sixty pounds, am twenty-three old and single. The best way to be as long as a fellow has a home.

May God bless you in your work. Give my love to Maria and Billy the Goat.



I have all four of your books. Yours for success,
WALTER E. DYER.

Thank you Walter, for your kind appreciation of my monthly stunt in these columns. I'm sorry I can't agree with you in the stand you take about single blessedness and hugging the family roof tree. If your father and mother had thought as you do, you probably would not be on this earth today. In a couple of years' time you ought to have a home of your own and you won't know what real life and real manhood are until you cut loose from your mother's apron strings and break away from the windward side of Pop's whiskers and seek out the girl of your choice and yourself become a homemaker. For every man that is single there is a woman denied her right to wifehood and motherhood. I would tax and tax heavily every man capable of supporting a wife, who remained single after the age of twenty-seven. If the man who remained single kept clean and virtuous, the single man would be less a menace than he is today. Menace, Uncle Charlie? I never realized a single man was a menace. Of course you didn't but a little thought will tell you that he is. There is no menace of the single man amongst savage tribes, for directly the young people are capable of reproducing their species, they have to marry. We don't want to copy savages, though we can learn even from them. We constantly hear people referring to this as a "swift age" and heaven knows it is a swift age, and getting swifter every minute. Once upon a time, and not so many years ago either, if a man wanted female companionship he had to marry. Today he can get not only companionship but practically all he wants of the opposite sex without incurring any obligations. Woman, a generation or two ago, was a thing of mystery to the average male. He stood almost in awe of the fair creature of whom he saw so little. All that is a thing of the past. Economics conditions have pushed women out of the home and made them dependent on other men for a living. Men wanted cheap labor and women supplied the need. Woman is a wage earner, but her wages are seldom sufficient to make her economically independent. So tens of thousands of women have to lean heavily upon man for support. It is among the leaners or those who have no one to lean upon, that the single man, and too often the married libertines as well, have preyed as a wolf preys on the sheepfold, and it is to better the condition of these women, and for that matter of all women—the millions who have no real homes and no protection—that I have pleaded and fought for the ballot, the most powerful instrument in the world for the uplift and betterment of all humankind. Familiarity too often breeds contempt, and now that men and women are daily rubbing shoulders in the business world, it is not to be wondered at that the old-time respect and even reverence for women, in the cities at least, is becoming a thing of the past. If there is a big fire, or a big earthquake, or anything that holds up the orderly process of law and order, out come the ghouls, the thieves and the criminals and begin to rob and loot. Woman in the ages past was man's toy and his slave, seldom his companion. Now that the struggle for existence has become so keen, and the sexes daily fight on the battlefield of life for a crust, the old animal instincts of men are ready to assert themselves, the vampires and libertines are on the job, and though all men are ready to protect their own, they are still more and more ready to prey upon those who are not their own. The average fellow will tell you that life is too uncertain and marriage too expensive a proposition for him to take a wife, so he stays single, and he and his girl chum fill the dance halls, the cabarets, the restaurants, the theaters, the movies, and they crowd the summer hotels and the beaches, and they drink alcohol as a fish swallows water, and puff cigarette smoke in each other's faces, and they go home in the small hours of the morning, or they don't go home at all, and the whole bunch of them prostrate themselves at the altar of pleasure, growing more reckless and more indifferent to the conventions every day of their lives, until disease and dissipation push them into the background; their places being immediately filled by another and

"Edith—what can I say to win you?" he cried, after a momentary struggle with himself. "I swear to you that I cannot—will not live without you. I will be your slave—your lightest wish shall be my law, if you will yield this point—come with me as my honored wife, and let me, by my love and unceasing efforts, try to win even your friendly regard. I know I have done wrong," he went on, assuming a tone and air of humility; "I see it now when it is too late. I ask you to pardon me, and let me atone in whatever way you may deem best. See!—I kneel—I beg—I implore!"

And suiting the action to the words, he dropped upon one knee before her and extended his hands in earnest appeal to her.

"In whatever way I may deem best you will atone?" she repeated, looking him gravely in the face. "Then make a public confession of the fraud of which you have been guilty, and give me my freedom."

"Ah, anything but that—anything but that!" he exclaimed, flushing consciously beneath her gaze.

"Your appeal was but a wretched farce—it is worse than useless—it is despicable," she said.

"Will nothing move you?" he passionately cried.

"Nothing."

"By Heaven! then I will meet you blade to blade!" he cried, furiously, and springing to his feet, his eyes blazing with passion. "If entreaties will not move you—if neither bribes nor promises will cause you to yield—we will try what lawful authority will do. I have no intention of being made the laughing stock of the world, I assure you; and, hereafter, I command that you conduct yourself in a manner becoming the position which I have given you. In the first place, then, tomorrow morning, you will breakfast in the dining-room with the family—do you hear?"

Edith had stood calmly regarding him during this speech; but, wishing him to go on, if he had anything further to say, she did not attempt to reply as he paused after the above question.

"Immediately after breakfast," he resumed, with something less of excitement, and not feeling very comfortable beneath her unwavering glance, "we shall return to the city, and the following morning you and I will start for St. Augustine, Florida—thence go to California and later to Europe."

The young girl straightened herself to her full height, and she had never seemed more lovely than at that moment.

"Monsieur Correlli," she said, in a voice that rang with an irrevocable decision, "I shall never go to Florida with you, nor yet to California, neither to Europe; I shall never appear anywhere with you in public, neither will I ever break bread with you, at any table. There, sir, you have my answer to your 'commands.' Now, let me pass."

Without waiting to see what effect her remarks might have upon him, she pushed resolutely by him and went swiftly up-stairs to her room.

The man gazed after her in undisguised astonishment.

"By St. Michael! the girl has a tremendous spirit in that slight frame of hers. She has always seemed such a sweet little angel, too—no one would have suspected it. However, there are more ways than one to accomplish my purpose, and I flatter myself that I shall yet conquer her."

With this comforting reflection, he sought his sister, to relate what had occurred, and enlist her crafty talents in planning his next move in the desperate game he was planning.

If You Are A Woman Who Loves Crochet And Tatting Here Is A Set Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

ANY ONE of these books alone is a veritable treasure house of the newest, most beautiful designs. The seven books combined form a complete library in which you will find any pattern in crocheting and tatting you could possibly ask for. You will fairly revel in the many handsome designs shown. There are edgings, beadings, insertions and laces for every conceivable use. The illustrations are actual photographs of the finished work and show every thread so plainly that they are almost as good to work from as the directions themselves. The directions are adapted for either beginner or expert. They tell stitch by stitch how each pattern is worked, also the quantity and size of material required and the correct sizes of hooks to be used. Following is a description of each book which is 8 by 10½ inches in size with the exception of Volume I which is 9¼ by 12 inches. Please order by numbers and titles.

Volume 1 contains a beautiful assortment of crocheted yokes for combinations, envelopes, nightgowns, corset covers, etc.—fifteen all different, exquisite patterns superbly illustrated by photographs with complete directions for working including quantity and size of material required, and correct size of hooks to use.

Volume 2 is a real treasure book of handsome crocheted edgings and insertions suitable for handkerchiefs, underwear, dresses and a multitude of other uses,—thirty-three different designs, all illustrated by photographs with full directions including a complete table of all the principal stitches used in crocheting and how to make them.

Volume 3 tells how to crochet Cluny laces. It contains eighteen lovely patterns in Cluny insertions and laces for centerpieces, library scarfs, boudoir caps, corset cover yokes, piano scarfs, curtains, chemises, envelopes or combination suits. Each pattern is illustrated by an actual photograph and the directions for making are full and explicit, including quantity and size of material, and size of hooks required. This book also shows all the principal crochet stitches and tells how to make them.

Volume 4 contains twenty-five handsome patterns in artistic crochet for yokes, boudoir caps, candle shades, baby bonnets, bedspreads, doilies, library scarfs, pillows, centerpieces, portiere medallions, curtains, etc., etc. Complete directions are given for working each and every design, including quantity and size of material and size of hooks required. The illustrations are actual photographs, all the principal crochet stitches are also named and full instructions given for making them.

Volume 5 consists of twenty-five patterns in novelty crochet, including mile-a-minute and clover leaf crocheted yokes, primrose and sunflower yokes; doilies, centerpieces, boudoir caps, unique edges and insertions for serving trays; novelty aprons and collars. Each design is illustrated by an actual photograph and the directions for working include a complete list of all the different crochet stitches, and how to make them.

Volume 6 is devoted entirely to tatting, Maltese and Irish crochet, containing a varied and beautiful assortment of tatted handkerchief edges, edgings, and insertions, tatted yokes, boudoir caps, towel edges, medallions; yokes, breakfast caps, centerpieces, edgings and lace in Maltese crochet and yokes in Irish crochet. The patterns are illustrated by actual photographs and the directions for making include the different stitches in tatting, Maltese and Irish crochet and how to them, as well as quantity and size of material and size of hooks required.

Volume 7 shows a variety of thirty handsome crocheted designs each one illustrated by a photograph of the real work showing just how the finished pieces look. There are rose, sunflower, periwinkle, and Venetian yokes; boudoir caps, monkey face library scarf and lace pillow; large and small baskets, hat pin holder, jewel box, vanity tray, coin purse, utility bag, star fish doily, pineapple centerpiece; edgings and insertions in pillow lace; daisy edging; spider, bell, rick-rack, novelty and coronation braid laces. Full directions accompany each design including quantity and size of material and size of hooks to be used, also all the principal stitches used in crochet and how to make them.

We advise you to order all seven of these splendid books before the assortment is broken, but if you do not care for the whole library at this time we have arranged the following special offers which give you the privilege of selecting any two or any four of the books as well as all seven of them. When ordering however, be very careful to state the number of each book desired.

Offer 8011A: For one 1-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you any two books free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention numbers of books wanted.

Offer 8011B: For your own subscription, or renewal or extension of present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all), we will send you any two books free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention numbers of books wanted.

Offer 8012: For two 1-year subscriptions at 25 cents each or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents we will send you any four books free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention numbers of books wanted.

Offer 8013: For three 1-year subscriptions at 25 cents each we will send you the complete library just as described above—seven different volumes in all, handsomely bound, printed on high-grade paper and containing nearly 200 beautiful photographic illustrations of all that is new and pretty in crochet and tatting designs with complete directions for working. When ordering please be sure to mention number of each book wanted.

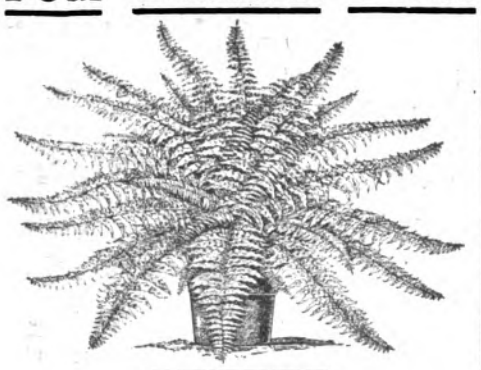
Pocket Flashlight



Given For A Club Of Three

THERE are so many occasions when a flashlight is a necessity it would be impossible to name them all but there is one thing sure—it is the handiest and safest means of illuminating ever devised. We offer here one of the best pocket flashlights made. It is known as the "Eveready," which is certainly an appropriate name as it is always ready when you want to use it. But the greatest feature of this flashlight is its safety around inflammable material. In the house it lights up the darkest rooms or clothes closets, dark corners in the basement, in the garret; it may be used around gasoline, or powder, in the stable, in the barn, even in the hay mow, and there is not the slightest danger of fire. It throws a shaft of steady brilliance right in the teeth of wind or rain. The mere pressure of your finger starts and stops the light at your will and it is so small and compact that you can carry it around in your vest pocket where it does not take up any more room than a cigarette box. The "Eveready" is beautifully finished in polished nickel with a hinged bottom which opens to replace the battery and is equipped with a push button as well as a sliding switch for a flash or continuous light. It is equipped with a Tungsten battery and bulb and gives a surprisingly powerful bright light and the battery with average use will last from two to four months. When one battery becomes exhausted you can easily buy another one anywhere as they are on sale in every city and town in the United States. Or, if you prefer, we will furnish you with additional batteries free of cost in return for a few subscriptions to COMFORT. We will send you this flashlight with battery and bulb complete, ready for business as soon as you receive it, upon the terms of the following

CLUB OFFER. For a club of only three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you one "Eveready" flashlight as described above free by Parcel Post prepaid. (Premium No. 7083.) We can also supply you with extra batteries for the "Eveready" at the rate of one battery free for a club of two one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each. (Premium No. 7092.)

Four Beautiful Ferns

Given For Two Subscriptions

OF all indoor foliage plants, none give more lasting pleasure and satisfaction than these popular house ferns. They need but little care and live indefinitely, growing larger and more beautiful year by year. The collection offered you here comprise four of the largest, handsomest varieties ever grown for house culture. They are the Asparagus Plumosus or "Lace" fern, the Roosevelt, the Boston or "Fountain" fern and the Whitmani or "Ostrich plume" fern. They will thrive in any dwelling room near a window and require almost no attention except a little sprinkling of water now and then. These ferns are guaranteed to be absolutely free from all injurious insects or diseases which destroy foliage plants of this type, and they will be packed carefully and mailed to you by Parcel Post so that you will be sure to receive them in just as good condition as though they were fresh from the greenhouse. We are able to illustrate only one variety, "The Roosevelt," but remember you get all four ferns free on this offer.

Club Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you by Parcel Post prepaid the above described collection of four beautiful ferns each one of them a strong, healthy, well rooted plant ready to pot and guaranteed to grow and develop into a fine specimen beauty. Premium No. 6112.

VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any question privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing as above.

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

GADFLY GRUBS.—Can you tell me what to do for my sheep? They have a hoarse cough. The head seems to be stopped up with a profuse discharge of mucus from the nostrils. At first they eat but little, jerk their heads, clinch their jaws together, grit their teeth, and froth at the mouth, just before they die, which is from three to five days. E. S.

A.—There is no doubt that gadfly grubs are causing the discharge and head jerking, but death seldom results from that cause alone. More likely the prolonged feeding of Timothy hay is to blame. It is poor feed for a pregnant ewe. Feed clover or Alfalfa hay, and add roots or silage and bran. Make the ewes take active exercise daily. There is no cure for the grubs but they may be prevented by smearing pine tar on the noses of the sheep in flytime in summer.

ITCHING SKIN.—My horse has some kind of a skin trouble, or else it is in his blood. It started a year ago from what I thought a foul stall. His hair came off under his front legs up near his body. He bites himself until the hair comes off in spots. He seems worse when heated. He is in fine condition. MRS. L. W.

A.—You are correct in thinking that wet and filth in the stall will start such a skin trouble. Do away with such conditions, and also have the stable light and well ventilated. Have the horse clipped and then apply to affected parts of the skin as often as found necessary a mixture of two ounces of flowers of sulphur, one half ounce of coal tar dip and one pint of cottonseed oil. Have the horse work or take active exercise every day.

CARPITIS.—My ten-year-old mule has a growth as large as a teacup on knee joint. It is as hard as bone. She limps some and her leg bends out quite a little when not in motion. Is there anything that will take this growth away or give her better use of leg? R. T. R.

A.—A bony growth (exostosis) is present and cannot be removed. Puncture-firing and blistering by a competent veterinarian might somewhat relieve the lameness. If you cannot have this done try the effects of oleate of mercury rubbed in once daily. First remove the hair.

KICKING HEIFER.—I have a heifer two years old this month. She will freshen in July. She was gentle when I put her in pasture last May. When I stabled her in October she would hook at me and if I touch her she kicks. When I clean the stable she kicks at the shovel. I can pat her back but cannot touch her stomach or udder. MRS. P. W. R.

A.—Put hobbles on the cow in a box stall and milk her or go through the motion of milking at the usual time twice daily. Perhaps a wide strap around the hind legs above hocks will suffice.

SHOE BOIL.—My horse has a shoe boil which swells up every spring and causes her to be very lame for a short time. After it discharges a while it goes down to a small bunch, about the size of an egg and does not trouble her again until the following spring. Can you tell what will remove it permanently? P. W. B.

A.—You should have the shoe boil amputated by a surgeon. This is a very simple operation. And after the wound heals the shoe boil should not return. If possible allow the horse a well-bedded box stall in the stable.

SKIN TROUBLE.—My mare has a breaking out on her shoulders where the collar works back on her sides and on top of her shoulders. The hair is off in spots and the skin is thick. She rubs herself until it bleeds. MRS. B. C.

A.—Clip the mare each spring. Meanwhile clip the hair from her belly and up to a line with the straps of the breeching and breast collar and also from the legs above knees and hocks. Every three days apply to the affected parts a mixture of two ounces of flowers of sulphur and one half an ounce of coal tar dip in a pint of cottonseed oil. If the trouble persists give one half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic night and morning until about one quart has been used; then gradually discontinue the medicine, taking a week or more to the work.

GREASE HEEL.—I have a saddle horse that has something wrong with his feet. One ankle is swollen. There are rough scales along his leg. Greasy pus runs out of his heels, and he has a high fever in hock joint. Please give remedy. J. L. V.

A.—As well as we are able to judge from your meager description the horse has grease heel. Do not wash the parts but paint them once daily with fish oil. Wipe the parts clean now and then.

GARGET.—I have a fine Jersey cow seven years old that has been giving stringy, lumpy milk. One quarter of udder has lumps in it. R. J.

A.—There is no remedy, the udder having been ruined by infective mammitis (garget) and the milk is unfit for any use and the trouble liable to be spread from cow to cow by the milker's hands. Such a cow should be isolated and fed for slaughter if a tubercular test has shown that she is free from tuberculosis. It is quite possible that tuberculosis of the udder is present.

BLOODY MILK.—Please give cause and treatment for cow that gives blood out of one teat when it is milked nearly dry. (2) Give treatment for colic in horses. A. E. C.

A.—Growths in the milk duct of the teat bleed at milking time and the only possible remedy would be to have them removed by operation. If you cannot have that done dry off the milk secretion in the affected quarter. (2) There is no general remedy for colic which is of five or six different kinds. If you care to describe the symptoms of the kind you mean we shall be glad to prescribe. A pint of raw linseed oil containing an ounce each of turpentine and laudanum is useful if inflammation of the bowels (enteritis) is not present.

WRYNECK.—I have a mare eleven years old that has a ridge on the right side of her neck and it seems as though the left side was drawn around. She holds her head to the left side and down close to the ground. She has no use of her right leg. MRS. A. H.

A.—Fracture of vertebra of the neck causes just such symptoms as you describe and that would result from an injury and prove incurable. If there is no possibility of an injury the disease is a form of rheumatism known as torticollis or wryneck, and improvement may follow if you can give one half an ounce of salicylate of soda three times daily in feed. Sabol would be a better remedy in two dram doses but is too dear at present to be profitably given.

LAME JACK.—Is there a remedy for a Jack that is two years old and whose front legs are stiff and when he lies down has to be helped up? MRS. O. U.

A.—Such a case is most unpromising as the Jack either has rickets, similar to bow legs in a child, or osteo-porosis, commonly termed "big head." Support him with strings and feed well on oats, bran, corn and mixed hay.

STRONG MILK.—I have a young Jersey cow that was fresh last June, it being her second calf. She will be fresh the middle of May. She gives a half gallon of milk at each milking. It is very strong tasting and will not sour easily. It becomes bitter before it sours and is very hard to churn, making strong butter. MRS. E. C. G.

A.—It will be necessary to dry off milk secretion as treatment will do no good. The milk should be normal in every way when the cow calves again.

LAME SOW.—I have a sow one year old. She has nine pigs two months old. She has been lame for three weeks and is getting so stiff she can hardly walk. What is the matter and what can I do for her? MRS. A. T.

A.—Wean the pigs at once as the drain and strain of sucking them is affecting the sow in the way described. This trouble most commonly affects pampered sows that are over fed on corn and kept confined. It doe snot attack sows that are fed mixed rations, and made to take abundant exercise every day. Rickets commonly are present.

TUMOR.—I have a broncho seven years old with a sore shoulder. It has calloused and left a lump about the size of an egg. It will heal over when I do not work her. When I do it gets raw again. Can you tell any way to get rid of this without an operation? W. R. S.

A.—Have the tumor cut out by a surgeon. That is the only successful treatment in such a case.

THIN MARE.—Please tell me what to do for my mare? She is very thin and will not fatten. (2) What can I do to rid her of lice?

A.—Have the teeth attended to by a veterinarian and also clip the horse if the coat is long and rough. Afterward feed well on whole oats, wheat, bran, ear corn and mixed hay. (2) Dust horse infected parts with a mixture of equal quantities of pyrethrum or sabadilla powder, sulphur and powdered tobacco leaves.

more youthful bunch of feather brained moths. They call this city New York, they call the big city at the southern end of Lake Michigan, Chicago. There is a better name for these big wildernesses of bricks and mortar. They should call New York Hell Number One, and Chicago Hell Number Two, and so on down the line. I know whereof I speak. In a month or two I will give you the vice report of one of our big eastern cities. I would have given it to you last year, but I was afraid it would spoil your Christmas dinner and make you think that God had turned His back on the world. Now Walter set up your home and make it the right kind of a home. That will mean that two human beings at least will be contributing the best that is in them to the upbuilding of the nation and the race. There are millions trying to shipwreck civilization and make the world a cross between a jungle and a barnyard, a sewer and a slaughter house. Don't you be one of these Walter. Anyone can be a hog, but it takes character, conscience and will power to be a man. The world needs men. It has a the hogs it can use. It is the lack of men, real men that makes life such a rocky road for humanity to travel. So get busy Walter, and do your duty.

PERRYOPOLIS, R. R. 2, PA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

We have taken COMFORT for a number of years. I read your answers and sermons every month and think they are fine. You are certainly doing a good work. I am sixteen years old, and passed the eighth grade examination for high school two years ago; but have not had the opportunity to go, as it is about three miles from my home.

I do not think much of the high school anyway for the teachers they send out do not amount to very much. I would like to get into your bookcase Uncle and make use of some of your histories. I am fond of reading and like to soar above the Laura Jean Libby grade of fiction. Most of the girls near my home would not look at a history if they did not have to. They think more of their looks and beaus. It is a disgrace to humanity the way some of them act. My father gives me many lectures on socialism. I have been trying to get him to pay tuition for me at the Belle Vernon High School so that I can go there. We are poor people Uncle and you know it takes money for an education.

I am sending for your book of poems and thought I would have a little chat with you. I would like to make you a visit and have a real talk with you, as most of the people I talk to think of nothing but gossip, and do not get down to good common sense they can do the talking, but have nothing said when they get through. (God knows that's true. Uncle C.)

Wishing you success and happiness and with love to Maria and Billy, I am, ELIZABETH PEARCE.

P. S. I thought your November sermon was great. It certainly ought to awaken every man and woman. I missed the December number but have renewed.

Elizabeth, yours is a dandy letter. You express yourself well and your handwriting is perfect. When I get a letter from a girl like you my heart beats faster and my eyes blink with delight. I'm so sick of the inanities, stupidities and frivolities of this crazy age. I am as full of fun as a wagon load of monkeys, but oh, I do get so sick and tired of listening to the idiotic prattle of the average young person, and I might add to the average middle-aged person. There never was a time when there was so much that was worth while to be talked about and discussed and there never was a time when people had such a gorgeous opportunity to stock their foolish and empty noddles with worth-while thoughts and golden nuggets of knowledge and wisdom as right now. The world is simply flooded with glorious literature. A few dollars will buy a library that all the gold in the world could not have secured a few centuries ago. Of course you country cousins don't have the chance to pick up the book bargains that we do who live in the cities. But even when good books are brought to people's attention, not one in two hundred are in the least bit interested. Carnegie's idea in spreading the country with libraries, full of good books, was to start people thinking. The Bible says: "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and all the rest shall be added unto you." Carnegie should have put across the entrance to his libraries: "Seek ye first the kingdom of books and knowledge and all else will be added unto you." If I could choose the reading of the world for just two months I could set the clock of civilization forward a thousand years. Elizabeth is fond of history. So am I. I love it. There are a few high spots that stand out in histories just as Pike's Peak soars above the surrounding plains. If you get acquainted with these beacon lights of history and the effect that they have had on moulding the future and swaying the destinies of nations, all the jumble of events that crowd the pages of the past quickly take shape and form, and the record of man's doings on this planet becomes easy to visualize, grasp and understand. It is the history of peoples not the history of kings that one wants to study. Maybe when this war is over I can tell you about some of these beacon lights. Some nations have progressed far along the broad and glorious highway of democracy while others have lagged behind. Why did some progress and why did others lag behind? Now I would like to put that question to every teacher in every schoolhouse in America, and I'll bet you that not one teacher in five thousand, let alone one scholar, could give an intelligent answer; and yet the whole thing is so easy and so simple. The history of every nation that is the worth-while part of it, could be told in a column of COMFORT, and almost in a paragraph or two. Well, histories as a rule are not written to open people's eyes and put humanity wise to man's age-long struggle for liberty and a worth-while existence. History is written to hypnotize the reader with a false sense of national glory and racial importance, written to befog, daze and obscure the vision instead of clear it. There is a little that is worth while in the histories of all countries, but very little. If all histories were truthfully written there would be few patriots. How many of those who read and study the Bible know anything about it? How many know when and how it was constructed and who put it together. If those who get hot about the gills when discussing the war in Europe knew a little about the history of the peoples engaged in that struggle, they might be able to discuss that war intelligently, and you can't discuss it intelligently until you know what is back of it all. I'm sorry Elizabeth, that you cannot come and browse among my books. On the two shelves of the bookcase immediately opposite me are the following books: "Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies," "Larned's History of the World," an invaluable work, "Ridpath's History of the United States," "Creasy's Fifteen Decisive Battles," a wonderful work; "Green's History of the English People," "Buckle's History of Civilization," "Gibbon's Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire." On the shelf below that, I have "The Story of a Piece of Coal," "The Story of The Planets," "Story of the Solar System," "The Story of the Alphabet," "Story of Primitive Man," "Story of the Stars," "Story of the Mind," "Story of Germ Life," "Story of Animal Life," "Story of Books," "Story of the Earth," "Story of Extinct Civilizations," etc., These are books that I know you would be greatly interested in. My only regret is that I cannot help you read and understand them, for I do love to aid in developing a mind like yours; a mind which is turning towards the light, a mind hungry for knowledge, yearning for the best the world has to give. God give us more such minds, for alas, they are pitifully few.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

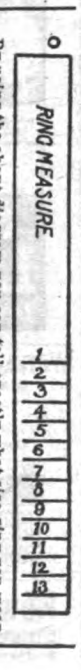
Birthstone Rings

Genuine Gold Filled

Guaranteed For 5 Years

Given For A Club Of Two!



THE most popular lady's rings worn today are these beautiful birthstone rings. Not only is it considered lucky to wear one of them but they are now and always will be exceedingly stylish. We are able to illustrate only three of the rings but there are twelve in all—a different stone for each month of the year and of course you should wear the stone that is symbolical of the month you were born. The following is a list of the twelve rings, names of the stones, the month to which one applies and its symbol.

No. 7632. January, The Garnet, Symbol of Power.
No. 7642. February, The Ameythyst, Symbol of Pure Love.
No. 7652. March, The Bloodstone, Symbol of Courage.
No. 7662. April, The Diamond, Symbol of Purity.
No. 7672. May, The Emerald, Symbol of Immortality.
No. 7682. June, The Agate, Symbol of Health and Long Life.
No. 7692. July, The Ruby, Symbol of Charity.
No. 7702. August, The Sardonyx, Symbol of Happiness.
No. 7712. September, The Sapphire, Symbol of Constancy.
No. 7722. October, The Opal, Symbol of Hope.
No. 7732. November, The Topaz, Symbol of Friendship.
No. 7742. December, The Turquoise, Symbol of Prosperity.

Each ring is guaranteed genuine 12-Karat gold filled which looks exactly like solid gold and will wear for years. In fact we absolutely guarantee each ring for at least five years. The rings themselves are perfectly plain, the stones are solitaires and perfect imitations of the real gems. The setting of each ring is the ever popular "Tiffany." As a Christmas, Birthday or all-the-year-round gift for wife, mother, sweetheart or sister nothing could be more appropriate and acceptable than one of these beautiful guaranteed rings set with the birthstone of the person to whom it is given. And not only the women and girls but men and boys as well are now wearing them.

Please do not class these rings with the cheap "electro-plated" rings that turn brassy after they have been worn a month or two. Remember that every one of them is guaranteed to be 12-Karat gold-filled and positively warranted for five years. If you want a handsome birthstone ring for yourself or some dear friend or relative you will make no mistake in taking advantage of this offer at once. When ordering be sure to specify the size and number of ring wanted. You can easily tell just what size ring you wear by following the directions at the right.

Club Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25c. each, or one three-year subscription (not your own) at 50c., we will send you one of these beautiful gold-filled birthstone rings by parcel post prepaid. Please be sure to give size and number of ring wanted. Address

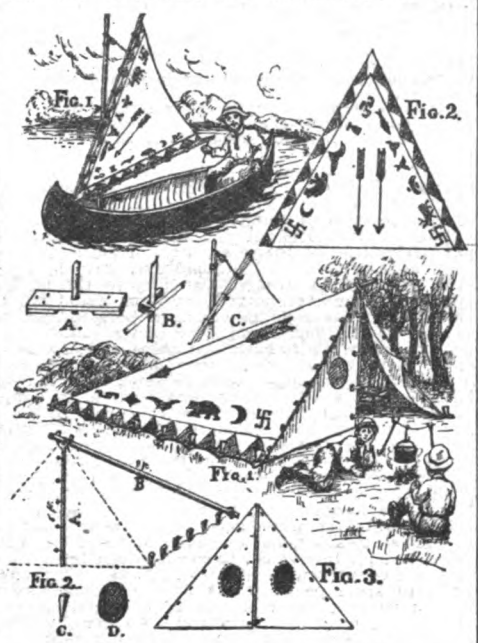
A Corner for Boys

By Uncle John



HELLO Boys! Step into my sanctum and sit down. You may leave the door open, for I dearly love sunshine and the scent of lilacs. How's fishing up your way? Any bullheads and sunfish biting? There ought to be. This weather is just right for them. It's right for mostly anything, I guess, except hard work. My, how I would like to get out my pole and line and loll with you on the grassy bank of some creek. In the springtime one always feels the call of the great outdoors, for spring is the childhood of the year and under its magic influence, we all become as little children. Responsibility slides off our shoulders and we want to romp and play. Perhaps our souls are really being renewed and made young again like the fields and gardens, or maybe it is that the surfeit of beauty on all sides creeps into our minds and literally crowds out pettiness and spite and fear. At any rate, we feel a distinct urging to be happy and optimistic and it is our duty to obey it. To do this, we do not actually have to neglect our work and go rambling. Spring abides everywhere, even in our hearts.

Indoor Game

To make an otherwise dull evening, at home, enjoyable, I advise you to try the game of "Turn-over." Two players participate. Each is provided with a sheet of paper and a pencil. To begin, a word of ten or more letters is chosen by mutual consent and each player writes it down at the top of his sheet. The one having first turn, usually the younger, writes one letter on his own paper and covers it with his hand. The letter must be in the word chosen, and the paper must remain on the table while it is being written. The left hand of the writer is used to conceal his efforts and false motions are made with the pencil to further deceive and mislead the layer who tries to guess what letter has been put down, by calling out, "Turnover 'g' or 'r'," or whatever one he may name. If he guesses correctly, he crosses that letter out of the word on his paper. If he fails to guess the right one, the other player crosses the letter written, out of his word. Thus, the object is to cross out all the letters in your written words before your opponent succeeds in doing so with his. Towards the end of contest keen interest develops. The letters are used only as often as they appear in the selected word and, when crossed out, may not be used any more. It is when only a few remain that a tense desire to win takes possession of you.

A Sail Tent

Decorating a canoe sail is a novel and practical idea. This is shown by Fig. 1. The letter "A" shows the base of the mast; "B" is the home-made fork by means of which the sail is swung round the mast; "C" shows how the sail is secured by rope and pulley to the top of the mast, and how it is lowered. Fig. 1 shows how the sail, mast and boom may be used for tenting. The additional part needed is the front of the tent. Fig. 3. Oval-shaped pieces of screen are stitched on to insure ventilation. Fig. 20 is a flat view of the sail. When it is stretched over the supports shown in Fig. 2, the base is fastened to the turf with short stakes "C" which fit through the rope loops used for reefing the sail. It is an extremely simple plan and will be useful to campers and canoeists who like to paddle to some distant point and stay over night. If you study the illustrations for a few minutes, I do not see how you can fail to understand the idea of decorating a sail and if needs be making a one night tent out of it.

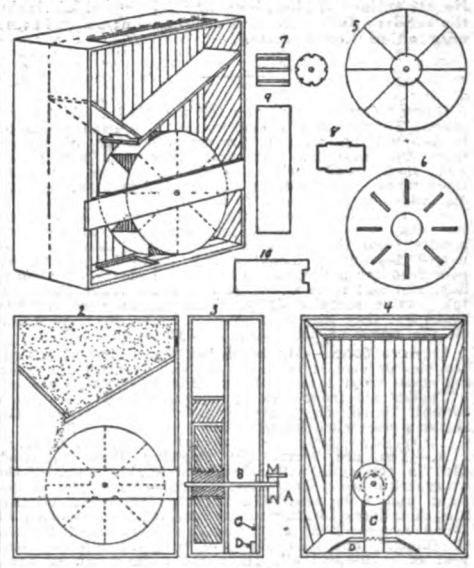
Horseshoe Game



The universally liked game of "Horseshoe" can be condensed into an indoor sport that will furnish capital amusement on a rainy day. If a table top is used for the playing ground, matches, stuck down between the leaves, will serve as stakes. The distance between them should be as great as the length of the table will permit the important point, being to allow a foot of space, between the table edge and the stake. Another way of arranging stakes is to force nails through folded newspapers and protect the table from the protruding heads by folding the paper back over them. If played on the floor, a rug may be the field and upright pins the pegs. Miniature horseshoes, one inch wide and two inches long, may be cut out of a piece of stiff leather or cardboard. The game is most interesting when played by four as this obviates moving back and forth. One member of each opposing team remains at each stake to pitch against each other. Scoring is done in the ordinary way: the nearest shoe to the peg counting one, a "ringer," four and a "leaner," three. If the two shoes nearest to the stake belong to one side, two points are credited to them. A game is finished when one side scores twenty-one points. If the player having first pitch, in the final set, completes the twenty-one points, it does not count until the other opposing has thrown his two shoes. This point frequently causes disputes.

Queer Occupation

In India and other countries of the far East, where the weather is extremely warm, it is the custom of hotel proprietors to hang over each bed a large, stiff square of some light material like thin wood or woven fibre. They are called "punkahs" and their purpose is to cool the sweltering guest beneath them, by swinging back and forth, fan fashion. They are operated by ropes tied to the beam from which they are suspended. The ropes pass through holes in the wall and then over various pulley blocks to the street in front of the building. Here, young natives, called "punkah boys," monotonously jerk the ropes all through the night. It is very uninteresting work but, if the youngsters lapse for a minute or two, the man in bed will instantly note it, by the discomfort he experiences, and will viciously pull the "punkah" as a signal to go on with the fanning. The poor lads are only paid a few cents a night, but this is considered good wages in India, and in front of every fair-sized hostelry, dozens of them may be seen busily plying their queer trade.

Sand Motor

This sand motor consists of a paper paddle wheel mounted in such a way that sand can be dropped upon the paddles and thereby cause the wheel to turn. It is shown complete in Fig. 1. After sliding off the paddles, the sand drops through the hole in the bottom of the box and is fed again into the top hole. The box has a partition in the middle through which the shaft and pulley protrude, and the latter may be belted to a toy or any light object that goes around. A box about ten inches square, made of cardboard or very light wood may be used. Heavy cardboard, fastened with glue, is the best material to use for all other parts. Dimensions are a matter of choice. Fig. 2 is a front view and Fig. 3 a side or sectional view. In Fig. 4, "C" and "D" are small wood blocks that make a support for the pulley. To make the wheel, cut out two disks like 6, eight paddles like 3, one wood hub like 7 and two outside covering disks like 5. The end projections of the paddle pieces fit into the hub, and the side projections into the slots in the disks 6 and are bent down and glued. Disks, without slots, like numeral 5 are then pasted to cover the paddle ends that are bent down. The parts 9 and 10 form the sand feed. It is a neat toy when finished and very amusing.

SAND MOTOR.

Foolish Questions

Most of us are addicted to the habit of asking foolish questions. If a friend comes in out of the wet we just naturally ask, "Is it raining out?" An acquaintance of mine detests this sort of nonsensical inquiry and frequently vents his spleen on innocent offenders. He works in a large office and one day was just about to make an important entry in a ledger when his elbow touched the ink bottle and a huge blot was the result. A fellow worker, noticing his discomfiture, ventured sympathetically, "What's the matter did you spill ink?" "No," came the gruff answer, "my fountain pen had a hemorrhage."

Riddles

When is beer like a bear?
When it is (a-brewin') a Bruin.

Who sees the most, a man with only one eye or a man with two eyes?
The man with one eye, because, in addition to everything else, he sees the other man's two eyes, while the latter can only see his one.

If a couple of Chinamen and a crazy man fell off a train, what would the conductor report?
Lost; two washers and a nut.

What is bought by the yard and worn by the foot?
Carpet.

April Puzzle

Nine objects are represented by the pictures shown below. When they are written down in a certain order, the initial letters will spell something relative to the month of April that boys enjoy very much. Try your luck and see if you can make out what it is.

Answer to Puzzle

Apple	Football
Pig	Opera glass
Revolver	Owl
Ivy	Lock
Lounge

The initial letters spell April Fool.

Well, this is all the space allowed me this month, but I think it contains enough to keep you happily employed until I write again. If you want to accomplish anything worth while in this life, you must cultivate the quality of "initiative." It is an ugly looking word but, withal, a most important one. It means the ability to get started; the knack of transmitting your mental plans into action. Every man of brilliant achievement has loads of it, but not all were born with it. Some of them saw the need of it when they were young and developed it from a small nucleus. Strange to say, when you use a thing of this kind, it grows bigger and stronger every day. What a blessing it is that this is so.

FRECKLES

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as the prescription othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.—Advt.

German Silver Mesh Purse

Given For Two Subscriptions

THIS is the new "Gate Top" mesh purse with a ten-inch wrist chain, made throughout of German Silver, handsome, stylish, and perfectly safe for the carrying of money and other valuables. A slight pull with the forefinger of each hand instantly opens the purse, a gentle pressure with thumb and finger closes it. Our illustration shows the purse closed. When open the top is as large as the bottom, or in other words, two inches in diameter. When closed it leaves an opening only three-fourths of an inch wide over which the brightly polished German silver cover snaps down tightly so that the contents of the purse cannot possibly become lost. This dainty purse is now extremely fashionable so we have purchased a quantity for the benefit of those of our lady and girl readers who like to be up-to-date in these little accessories. You can have one of them free by taking advantage of the following

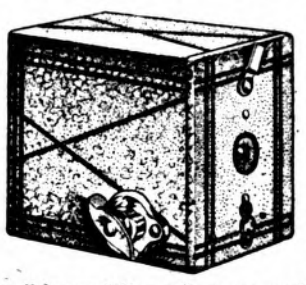
Pair Of Turkish Towels

Premium No. 7323



For Three Subscriptions

AFTER bathing there is nothing quite as fine as a good rub down with a Turkish towel, in fact it is the best towel for all purposes, whether for the bath or guestroom or for everyday family use in the lavatory, in kitchen or pantry. They absorb the water much more readily than other towels and the thick, heavy fleece-like surface imparts to the body a delightful feeling of warmth and well-being, exhilarating the whole system and literally making one feel like "jumping over a high board fence." These towels are also fine for baby's toilet as they will not hurt the tender skin. The towels we offer here are genuine Turkish towels—not the imitation kind—and are 17 inches wide and 36 inches long which is a good convenient size for all-round family use. They are of good weight, well made and finished. We will make you a present of one pair of these fine Turkish towels upon the terms of the following special Club Offer. For a club of three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you one pair (2) of these towels free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 7323.

PREMO CAMERA

Premium No. 7314

For a Club of Four!

We will also include free of charge one Six Exposure Roll Film Cartridge and a complete Instruction Book. This is the well-known "Premo" camera, made by the Eastman Kodak Co., therefore you can depend upon it to produce the most pleasing and satisfactory results. It takes a picture 1 1-4 by 1 3-4 inches, is fitted with the best quality Meniscus lens and an automatic shutter adapted for snap shots and time exposures. The pictures may be taken either the long way or the short way of the camera. It uses the regulation roll film cartridge containing six exposures, and this may be put in the camera and taken out again in broad daylight, so that you don't have to go into a dark room every time you want to load the camera. Anybody can make good pictures with this camera. Being small and compact it is just the thing to carry with you to "snap" pictures of your friends, sports, etc., with. And remember, we send you not only the camera itself but also include One Six Exposure Roll Film Cartridge and Instruction Book, all packed together in a strong box and sent to you Free by Parcel Post, prepaid, on the terms of the following special Club Offer. For a club of four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or two 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you by Parcel Post, prepaid, this Premo Camera with one Roll Film Cartridge containing six exposures and complete Instruction Book. Premium No. 7314.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Mrs. H. E. B., Cathlomet, Wash.—The total vote of New York City at the November, 1916, election was 697,431. The total vote from Chicago has not yet been received at this office, though the total presidential vote of Cook county was 847,602.

W. M. R., Farina, Ill.—Montana has 16,649,725 acres of public lands, surveyed and unsurveyed, which are subject to entry and settlement, and Wyoming has 28,528,492 acres. How much of this is worthless, we do not know, but we do know that much of the land of those states, while good enough in other particulars is useless because of its inaccessibility. No matter how big and fine crops a farmer may raise, if he can't get them to market, he might as well not raise them. Write to Commissioner of the Land Officer, Interior Dep't, Washington, D. C. for detailed information. We wish to say in this connection that the man with good business sense will pay more and get improved land. Twenty-five years or so ago the homesteader could sometimes get hold of a good thing, but they are very scarce these days. The trouble is all the good ones near markets, railroads and other forms of civilization have been taken. But sometime the railroads will be extended to reach all out-of-the-way lands that are worth having.

J. B. S., Gashland, Mo.—Why don't you read COMFORT more closely and understandingly? Time and again we have told inquirers that the so-called needles to find gold, hidden treasure, and such things, are frauds and the Government would not permit the use of the mails to sharpers offering such fakes for sale. Because you live in Missouri, do you have to be shown?

Mrs. Cora Colhour, Realitos, Texas, lives seventy-five miles from a library and her greatest deprivation is lack of reading matter and if any of COMFORT'S readers have any old magazines they are through with, she will be very grateful for them. She is not able to buy new magazines. Here's a chance for COMFORTERS to help a lonely sister who is worth helping.

B. L. B., Ruthana, Ky.—We cannot advise you definitely on the subject of farmers securing government loans under the new laws and we suggest that you and all other COMFORT inquirers seeking such information go to their nearest local banks and get it direct and authoritative, at the same time getting information and advice from the banks that could not be secured elsewhere, and are absolutely necessary in securing needed loans.

Mrs. M. B., Green Valley, Wis.—Farms in the eastern states, particularly in New England, may be had at very reasonable prices and ready to live on, but they are not such farms as you have in the West and most of your farming will be in fruits, vegetables, eggs, chickens and such things for local markets. But there is money in that sort of farming, if the farmer knows his business and attends to it. These farms are small ones, ranging from ten to fifty acres. There are larger ones, up to two or three hundred acres, but they are not so near markets and the usual farming is carried on on them, but not many farmers are rich on the larger farms. Land varies in price from $50 an acre up to large figures in special localities for small farms. Land may be bought for less than fifty dollars an acre, but it is not always the lowest priced land that is the cheapest in the end. Good land at low prices may be had in Virginia and other Southern states, east. We insist always that persons buying farms on which they expect to live, first look them over and understand what they are getting and what are the living conditions. The best farm on earth is worse than the worst, if you are better satisfied on the worst. With potatoes selling for nine dollars a barrel potato farms in Maine are in demand at fancy prices.

Mrs. S. R., Cedar Glades, Ark.—Properly packed you can send almost anything through the mails by parcel post. Ask your postmaster. The color you see on the top of the water is no doubt oil, as it is very common all over the country. The thing to know certainly about is is there enough of it down in the ground to justify sinking a well for it. We know of several oil springs, so called because the water is so impregnated with oil, but in fifty years nobody has been able to discover the other indications necessary before sinking a well, and no well has been sunk. Yours may be different, but with the urgent need of oil now prevailing, if your section of country has it beneath the surface the oil men would be there with their drilling machines.

A. B., Merrick, Okla.—Your own state has a mother's pension law providing for indigent women whose husbands are dead, or insane, or prisoners in any state institution. Make inquiry of any of your town or county officials for particulars. Other states have such laws, but you are eligible only in your own state.

L. H., Burleson, Texas.—You are much nearer New Mexico than we are and you should make a trip over there and look about for a location to teach school. Good teachers are in demand, but they are not employed by mail, so letters you might write will not be worth much, especially as you have no certificate. We certainly can't tell you where to go.

J. G., Grape Vine, Texas.—The way to sell stories to COMFORT or to any other magazine, is to mail them to the editor with postage for their return in case they are not accepted. Send one to The Threshold, Ridgewood, N. J., which wants fiction material from new writers rather than the experienced ones.

Miss B., New York, N. Y.—If none of the cements at drug-stores will hold your alabaster clock pieces together, try a cement made of half pint of vinegar and half pint of skimmed-milk. Mix this curd with the whites of five eggs well-beaten and sufficient powdered quicklime to form a paste. If this will not hold, you had better buy a new clock. P. S. If you don't need so much, you can cut the proportions down to what you want.

Mrs. J. B. L., Sandford, Fla.—We have no lists of private or class educational institutions, either in Arizona or New Mexico, or any other state. The only way to secure such information, or lists if they exist, would be to write to State Superintendent of Education, at the capital of the state you want to know about. That is local information to be had only on the premises, so far as we know.

R. B., Dayton, Iowa.—Gunpowder cannot be made in small lots. A regular factory is required for its manufacture, and the process is very dangerous.

W. F., Natchez, Miss.—The "coon dog" is a product of science, not nature. That is, any sensible and courageous dog can be taught to hunt coons, though only a few ever become so expert as to be entitled to the name. Get any good breed of dog when he is young and take him to the woods and fields where you can train him. Most people who have good coon dogs will not sell them, so you must train your own.

E. C., Darby, Pa.—Most magazines which accept verse pay for it, but some do not, though they require as high a standard as those that do, so it is not easier to get in free than to be paid for it. As a goodly number of COMFORT readers wish to see themselves in print, either in prose or verse, regardless of the pay they may get, we suggest that all such try their literary efforts on their local publications, newspapers or otherwise. Much verse is printed this way and some famous poets and prose writers got their start in their local papers.

Mrs. W. S., Levels, W. Va.—Your red and white striped corduroy cannot be washed successfully as it will run. Possibly an expert laundry might do it, but that is not sure. Have it dry-cleaned.

J. S., Montgomery, Minn.—You don't recharge your dry battery, but even if you could, it would cost much more than to buy a new one. You can get one at the nearest garage, or dealer in electrical supplies.

S. J. R., Oakhurst, Texas.—We suppose your "Twelve old days" refer to the twelve days after Christmas, January 6, when the feast of the Epiphany is celebrated. The Epiphany is a Christian festival commemorating the manifestation of Christ to the Magi at Bethlehem. (2) Florists grow long stems on roses by confining the plants at the beginning in close frames, or boxes, so that they will grow to the light before branching out. They also, with some clip off the lower branches and confine the whole strength of the plant to the main stem. On this one rose will grow much larger than if the plant's strength went to several.

R. E. S., Starks, Fla., writes that skunk odor may be removed by dipping the garment in gasoline and hanging in the open to dry. As many as three dippings may be required in severe cases. Mrs. L. B., Salt Lake City, Utah, says it may be done by hanging the clothes or skins on wire and burning cedar boughs under them, making a strong smudge, but being careful not to injure the skins by the heat. Miss V. R., Hammersville, Ohio, also suggests the burning cedar treatment. L. G., Blandon, Pa., says if a thin layer of common salt is spread over the affected parts and left for three hours, the odor will be gone. Any COMFORT sufferers trying these remedies will please report results to us.

it will be a great help. Fall rye is one of our surest crops here. Oats usually do not make a very heavy stand. What do you advise?

C. A. T., Van Tassell, Wyo.

A.—Such a plan will not succeed. The rye may ripen before the oats. Sow the rye in the fall, or rye and oats may be sown together and cut when ripe, but it is a better plan to seed together spring wheat—Marquis wheat preferred—and oats. We mix two of oats and one of wheat and sow two and one half bushels per acre on good ground.

CORRESPONDENCE COURSE IN AGRICULTURE.—Do you publish books on Scientific Farming, Stock Raising and Dairying? If so, what is the price of your full course? If not, please tell me where I can obtain such a course. I always read the "Modern Farmer" page with interest.

X. Y. Z., Sheridan, Mich.

A.—We do not publish or sell any books on farming. The free bulletins published by the Federal government supplemented by those issued by the State Experiment Stations pretty thoroughly cover every branch of agriculture including stock-raising and dairying. Also many of the state agricultural colleges and experiment stations give free extension courses which are equivalent to correspondence courses in the science of agriculture. Write to the Extension Division of the State Agricultural Experiment Station, Lansing, Michigan, for bulletins and advice; also to Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., for list of free government bulletins, and after studying it send for such as you are interested in.

FEEDING MOLASSES.—Have read that molasses is recommended as cheap feed for a horse. Directions called for one quart of molasses mixed with three quarts of hot water and then thoroughly stirred into corn meal, wheat bran and cut hay to make one feeding; same to be fed night and morning. With molasses at ten cents a quart two feedings a day would cost $1.40 a week, which I do not think very cheap. Is it meant for two quarts of molasses a day to be fed? A. S., Lyndon Station, Wis.

A.—Blackstrap molasses may be bought cheaply in some places near sugar refineries and then is used for horses, not so much because it is cheap as for the reason that it is wonderfully effective in plumping up a thin horse and especially one that has been troubled with harness galls and sores. It is a cheap remedy in such cases even at ten cents a quart. Two quarts a day is the quantity commonly fed.

OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I would like to give my ideas on some of the subjects in a recent number of COMFORT.

Mrs. Reynolds thinks when we get birth control we will be a nation to be envied and I think the devil will have gained a patent on one more of his inventions. God says, in the third chapter of Genesis, 16th verse, "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children." Mrs. Reynolds thinks we should not shrink from the laws of man but we can shrink from the laws of God. If God did not give us our children, who did? You may have given them their little bodies but who gave them their souls?

I ha e four children, two boys, aged seven and five years, and two girls, aged three years and eight months. I think God gave them to me and I would as soon take one of their little lives now as to have taken it before they were born.

As far as the penitentiaries and asylums and such places are concerned, we have just as many in them that came from small families as came from large.

There are hundreds of women in our country that are controlling the size of their families. What for? Because they do not want the responsibility children bring and they want more time for their own pleasure.

My dear sisters, I fear that when we stand before the Judgment Bar of God, with our lives an open book, that birth control will send more souls to hell than whiskey will.

Just a few words on Georgie's letter. If they had a forty-acre farm and things were not sanitary, it must have been their own fault. She says in the city they are compelled to keep their yards clean. We do not need a law to make us clean our yards, do we? If our children live close to nature it is easier to teach them right about such things. Your city children live close to things that are contrary to nature. Our boys can get manual training, that is of some account, on the farm. Our girls can learn domestic science in our own kitchens and will not only be good cooks, but good housekeepers as well.

Where are some of our good, old-fashioned mothers? Let us hear what you think of birth control.

With best wishes for COMFORT and all the sisters,

A Happy Wife and Mother.

Poems Requested

The following poems have been requested by readers of COMFORT and sent for publication.

An Overworked Reciter

Once there was a little boy, whose name was Robert Reece,
And every Friday afternoon he had to say a piece.
So many poems thus he learned that soon he had a store
Of recitations in his head, and still kept learning more.
And now this is what happened: He was called upon one week,
And totally forgot the piece he was about to speak.
His brain he cudgled. Not a word remained within his head!
And so he spoke at random, and this is what he said:
"My beautiful, my beautiful, who standeth proudly by.
It was the schooner Hesperus—the breaking waves dashed high.
Why is the Forum crowded? What means this stir in Rome?
Under a spreading chestnut tree there is no place like home!
When Feedom from her mountain hight cried, 'Twinkle, little star.'
Shoot, if you must, this old gray head, King Henry of Navarre!
Roll on, thou deep and dark blue castle crag of Drachenfels;
My name is Norval; on the Grampian Hills, ring out, wild bells!
If you're waking, call me early, to be or not to be;
The curfew must not ring tonight. Oh, woodman, spare that tree.
Charge, Chester, charge! On, Stanley, on! And let who will be clever!
The boy stood on the burning deck, but I go on forever!"
His elocution was superb, his voice and gesture fine;
His schoolmates all applauded as he finished the last line.
"I see it doesn't matter," Robert thought, "what words I say,
So long as I declaim with oratorical display!"

An "If" for the Girls

If you can dress to make yourself attractive,
Yet not make curls and puffs your chief delight;
If you can swim and row, be strong and active,
But of the gentler graces lose not sight;
If you can dance without a craze for dancing,
Play without giving play too strong a hold,
Enjoy the love of friends without romancing,
Care for the weak, the friendless and the old!

If you can master French and Greek and Latin,
And not acquire as well a priggish mien;
If you can feel the touch of silk and satin
Without despising calico and jean;
If you can ply a saw and use a hammer,
Can do a man's work when the need occurs,
Can sing when asked without excuse or stammer,
Can rise above unfriendly snubs and slurs;

If you can make good bread as well as fudges,
Can sew with skill and have an eye for dust;
If you can be a friend and hold no grudges;
A girl whom all will love because they must;
If sometimes you should meet and love another
And make a home with faith and peace enshrined,

And you its soul—a loyal wife and mother—
You'll work out pretty nearly to my mind
The plan that's been developed through the ages,
And win the best that life can have in store.
You'll be, my girl, a model for the sages—
A woman who the world will bow before.

Silver Tatting Shuttle

Given For Three Subscriptions

MADE of solid sterling silver beautifully finished and polished. A new idea is the hook at the end as shown in above illustration which easily and quickly picks up the loops. The illustration shows how the shuttle is held in the hand and the little arrow points to the patent hook in the act of picking up the stitch or loop. The free end of the thread goes through a small hole on the inside of the shuttle. A further description of this handy little device is hardly necessary for every woman who does tatting will see at a glance how really indispensable it is and how greatly superior to anything else ever designed for the same purpose. Being made of genuine sterling silver, you can have your jeweler engrave it with any monogram or initials desired. One of these shuttles engraved in this manner makes a very acceptable gift for any woman or girl who is a tatting worker. We will send you this tatting shuttle free upon the terms of the following.

Club Offer. For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25c each we will send you this sterling tatting shuttle free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7833.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

APRIL showers bring May flowers, they tell us, my dears, but unless you live quite a ways down South you will find, if you are not careful, that they also bring sore throat, cold in the head and a few other disagreeable things of that nature, so if you are wise you will be friendly with April, but not familiar. However, it's a cheerful month and if you can keep your dispositions in the cheerful April condition, you and everybody else will have a lot more sunshine around than if you didn't. I could say a lot more on this subject, but there's work to do and that crowds out the talk. So here's at it.

The first letter I open is from Rosy Cheeks, Bar Harbor, Maine, that very fashionable place in summer, and she wants to know if I think she would be happy if she married the young man who is now equally attentive to her and her chum, but she thinks she could win him. What she is most afraid of is that her chum will be around after she is married and maybe her husband will take notice of the chum. Now, girls, isn't that a fine condition of mind to be in about getting married? Even before she marries the man, she doubts him and yet she is willing, apparently, to take the chances and marry him! Is it any wonder that there are so many unhappy marriages when they begin like that?

Sunbeam, Oklahoma City, Okla.—Do not give him your picture until your mother says you may give it; and if he gives you his, which he must do before you give him yours, show it at once to your mother. I think she will know what to do to quiet your throbbing heart.

Brown Eyes, Hugo, Minn.—Don't drop the friendship of the nice young man, but hold fast to it—hold fast until you are twenty-two and he is twenty-nine, which is only seven years and you will then be just the right age to make the friendship permanent.

Blue Eyes, Rocky Point, N. C.—Some children are unfortunate in their parents, and about as often as some parents are unfortunate in their children and how it is to be remedied I don't know. If your parents will not let you have young company as other young people do, and some day you get into bad company simply through hunger for what is your natural food, nobody can be blamed except themselves. They should realize this as you are growing up and give you such opportunities of association as all young people should have, if they are expected to become the right kind of grown people. I can't help you and I wish I could.

Edea, Greenville, S. C.—I am not much in favor of Jew and Gentile marrying, but if you love the Jew and do not love the Christian, both of whom want you, you may be happier not to marry the Christian. Now, my dear, you may choose as you please.

Blue Eyes, Shelton, Nebr.—I thought, my dear, I had said so many times that love cannot be won, that nobody would ever ask me again, but you do and as innocently and ignorantly as though you really thought you could win the young man's love who doesn't care enough for you even to talk to you. He couldn't love you if he tried to. Why don't you love some other man who loves you? You can't, can you? Of course not, for love goes its own way. If it happens to be your way, all right. If not, you must suffer.

G. G., Wise, Va.—Be polite and pleasant whenever you meet the young man you want to call on you, and when you find that he is responsive, ask him to call. That is perfectly proper, but you mustn't be gushy about it, and if he doesn't call, don't ask him again, though you may be even friendlier than ever when you meet him. If he wants to come, he will, and if he doesn't, you shouldn't want him.

Betty, Morgan, Minn.—As you have your doubts about loving him well enough to marry him, and he is afflicted with the vice of gambling, I think you would be wise not to marry him. Gambling is just about as difficult to live with as drunkenness and it is about as hard for the man to quit it. As between a gambler and a drunkard for a husband, the chances are about even, and only a fool girl will marry either if she knows in advance what they are.

Troubled, Sulligent, Ala.—The way for you to treat this young man who treats you any way he pleases and pleases most to make you suffer by his neglect, is to decline to have anything to do with him. He is mean and jealous and inconsiderate and likes another girl better than he does you. How much worse do you want him to be before your self-respect is aroused? If he is the first you ever loved, maybe with this experience you will do better next time. Try it and see.

Two Girls, Sweetwater, Tenn.—Better be sure of the new friend, before you give up the old. (2) If you want to go through life without daring to speak to any other man except your husband, marry the jealous man. They're awful, and jealous women are no better.

Woful, Post City, Texas.—The easy and sensible way out of your trouble about the one you want and the one your parents want, is to announce definitely that you will not marry anybody until you are twenty-one. In four years, the two young men will have plenty of chance to prove which is the one for you. If both stay true that long, take the one you want.

Troubled, White Salmon, Wash.—I don't approve of cousins marrying, as a rule, but when two second cousins really love each other and not to marry would mean unhappiness for both, I am willing to concede a little, and you have my blessing if you marry your second cousin. There is no law against it. (2) Engaged couples may kiss each other and often do. Sometimes too often. (3) The engagement ring may be given at any time after the engagement.

Blue Eyes, Gulfport, Miss.—You did very properly in kissing him when he asked you to marry him and you agreed, but I can't tell whether you will be happy or not, though I sincerely hope you will. Nineteen and twenty-four may be a little young, but you will outgrow that in a few years.

V. I. B., Phoenix, Ariz.—You may ask your correspondent for his photograph, but you should not exchange with him, unless you happen to have a snapshot of yourself which is very informal and not like a regular photograph. I don't like the idea of a girl giving her photograph to a man, because men sometimes abuse such a privilege. Not often, but often enough to make girls very careful. You may ask him to visit you after his school closes. But don't fall in love with him, until he is in love with you, or you will be mighty sorry.

Broken-hearted, Penhams, Va.—You think he loves you because you so greatly love him. Sensibly though, if he really loved you, don't you know he could not have any desire to forget you, as you say he has? You've lost your heart, but don't loss your head, and try to use common sense in judging the young man.

M. E. D., Colton, Tenn.—Sometimes sweethearts, who are really and truly sweethearts who fully understand each other and will marry by and by, I think may properly kiss each other good night, and as you seem to be this kind, I shall give my consent. Whether a man loves a woman as much after he has kissed her as he did before, I cannot say. That may depend on the significance he attaches to the kiss. My chief objection to kissing is that it is very apt to become promiscuous and vulgar if indulged in indiscriminately.

F. M., Modesto, Cal.—Until you are engaged to a young man you can have just as many beaus as you can attract and none of them has any right to object. When you are promised to one, it becomes different and that one may properly object to others. (2) Obey your father about the elderly foreigner. You know your father ever so much better than you do the other one.

Inquirer, Grayson, Ky.—You did right in not promising in advance to be the young man's "steady company" when he left school. There is ample time for such a claim when he can be present and take care of it. In the meantime, my dear, while he is at school, don't you think you could put in a little more time on your grammar and spelling which seems worse when written as nicely as you write. For example, how could you ever spell it, "interdoction?" And why should you say "he never has went with but two girls?" If his school is doing him any good, one of your letters would give him hysterics.

Daisibell, Spencer, W. Va.—Eighteen is too young for a girl to marry, when she is educated, but really, when one of that age doesn't write and spell any better than you do, she shouldn't marry till she can improve her mind somewhat. It would be a shame for you to marry and have children who would write and spell as their mother does. Think of that and don't marry yet a while.

Darling, Pike, Ga.—The only way to carry on a correspondence properly is to wait just as long to answer a letter as the young man waited till he answered yours. And you'll do that, if you don't like him better than he does you. Ask your parents if they don't think you are too young to have beaus. If they don't, they don't know much about raising girls right.

Puzzled, Lexa, Ark.—Girls of sixteen are likely to think they will die if they don't get the one they love, but deaths from that cause are very few. If your young man of eighteen is really making $100 a month in Arkansas, he is a genius that your father should be glad to have in the family, instead of wanting to kill him if you run away with him. Suppose you wait until you are twenty-one.

Blue Eyes, Bagley, Minn.—Now and then a young man goes to see a girl because he likes her and wants to talk to her, without trying to kiss her and make love to her. But this kind is scarce, and if you have found one, don't be asking me why he doesn't try to kiss you and make love to you, but do everything you can to continue his good impression of you as a girl of sense and character. Just now, I am inclined to think he is mistaken and I know he would think so too, if he could read your letter to me.

There, my dears, your questions are answered, with the usual exceptions, and I haven't scolded any more than was necessary, have I? However, scolding is like salt in our food, and some must be used or things won't taste right. But the salt is good and so is the scolding. So run along now and get ready to begin the summer girl season. Isn't it just too sweet for anything? By, by.

Uncle Charlie's Home Fund

THE sum of $261.00, contributed by 434 people through donations and subscriptions, was added to Uncle Charlie's Home Fund in February, bringing the total up to $1,141.00 contributed by 1,548 readers of COMFORT. The largest single contribution for the month came from Mrs. Ida Jones, New Moorefield, Ohio, who, though living in a country district, sent in a number of subscriptions, sold 50 poems and story books and contributed $5.00 in cash.

While Billy Sunday can roll in the luxury of the $8,000.00 automobile presented him by the "trail-hitters" of Detroit less than one in a thousand of those who read Uncle Charlie's inspiring talks have contributed a cent or lifted a finger to help provide him with a home.

I trust that the Easter spirit will move you to give a substantial token of your appreciation of Uncle Charlie's noble work.

Again let me remind you how you can help:

1. By cash donations.

2. By purchasing Uncle Charlie's books (see advertisement.)

3. Those who cannot spare the money for a cash donation or for purchase of his books can contribute by getting subscriptions to COMFORT in aid of the "Uncle Charlie Benefit Fund" and instead of taking the club premium or cash commission themselves direct that it be credited to the fund. In such cases I will pay over to Uncle Charlie one half of the subscription price of all subscriptions sent for this purpose. The regular cash commission on COMFORT subscriptions is 40 per cent, but for Uncle Charlie's Benefit Fund I will allow 50 per cent. Another way to help him and benefit yourself is to get up a subscription club and take one of his books as your premium.

In one or other of these ways every COMFORT reader who wishes to do so can help swell the fund for Uncle Charlie which has my hearty approval and will have my assistance.

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

Comfort's League of Cousins

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a one-year subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York, grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Here is a chance for you to do good, a chance for you to lay up treasure in heaven, where no bank robber can swipe it. The Christianity that is worth while consists in helping others. If you don't help others you are a mighty fine hypocrite, but you are no Christian. Help me in this work.

Lovingly yours,

26-Piece Daisy SILVER SET

Premium No. 6808

Sent To You Prepaid For A Club Of Eight

WE have in the past made many offers of table ware, but this is the first time we have ever been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for such a small club of subscriptions. And please don't think that because we are giving away this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. This Set which we offer you here is plated on a white metal base therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and decorated with the beautiful Daisy design which is now so popular and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished.

WARRANTED FOR FIVE YEARS

It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have ever offered, in fact we are so sure that it will please and satisfy all who accept this offer we are going to guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this beautiful 26-Piece Daisy Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of eight one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or four 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Daisy Table Set Free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 6808.

Crochet and Tatting Book

Premium No. 7321

Containing Sixty-three Beautiful Photographic Reproductions of New Fashionable Designs In Crochet And Tatting With Full Instructions For Making.

For One Subscription

EVERY woman who is interested in crocheting and tatting should have a copy of this new book written by Winifred Worth and containing many designs used by the nuns in convents never before published. The book is of good size, measuring 8 inches by 10½ inches, printed on fine quality coated book paper and consists of 28 pages on which are shown sixty-three large, clear photographic illustrations of the prettiest edgings, beadings, insertions, towel ends, doilies, etc., and a splendid variety of new, dainty designs in tatting with complete instructions for making them. The art of combining Venetian crochet and tatting also is fully explained.

Among the many beautiful crochet designs illustrated and described are the clover leaf, Irish, picot, cross-bar, half-shell, half-wheel, K-stitch and filet edgings; festoon, Irish, fence-row, picot and shell beadings; mile-a-minute, half-shell, clover leaf, filet and monkey-face insertions; butterfly wings, Van Dyke Point, nuns' pattern and many others. The tatting motifs are varied and beautiful, consisting of beadings, edgings and insertions for table mats, bedspreads, curtains, guest towels, coin-purses, night-gown yokes, bath towels, sash curtains, ribbon holders, plate doilies, etc., etc.

This book also gives sizes of hooks best adapted for the different sizes of crochet threads, the abbreviations of all of the principal crochet stitches and terms used in tatting and tells how the different stitches are made such as the chain stitch, double crochet, half treble, double treble, treble crochet, cluster and open mesh stitches.

We will send you free and postpaid this book of the loveliest fashions in beautiful lace and tatting work with simple and complete directions which you can easily follow upon the terms of the following special offer:

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

C. T. S., New Mexico.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property acquired after marriage except such as is acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent, or such as may be purchased by money acquired before marriage, or the income of property acquired as above stated, is community property and that upon the death of the husband, after payment of debts and expenses, the wife would receive one half of such community property absolutely and in the absence of a will one quarter of the balance of such community property, the remaining three eighths of such community property going to the children of the decedent in equal shares.

Mrs. C., Ohio.—Under the laws of Oklahoma, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a man, leaving no will, and leaving no widow, child or descendant, and leaving no father, his whole estate after payment of debts and expenses would go to his mother in preference to his brothers and sisters.

Mrs. C. D. H., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a will must be signed by the testator himself, or in his presence by his direction, and unless wholly written by himself, by two witnesses in his presence; we do not think a mere statement in a letter as to the method the testator intended to dispose of his property could be probated as a will.

Mrs. F. C., Louisiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that it is possible to obtain a good title to real estate through a possessory ownership or through tax sales, but we can form no opinion as to whether this has been done in the case you submit, on the information you send us. (2) We think if your deed was recorded, you can now procure a certified copy of the same.

Mrs. H. H., Montana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a widow and one child as his only heirs at law and next of kin, his estate, subject to the payment of debts and expenses, would go in equal share to such wife and child; we think such child is entitled to such share regardless of the fact that he is a child of decedent by a former marriage.

Mrs. D. H. W., Kentucky.—We do not think your husband has any legal right to keep you from visiting your friends and relatives to a reasonable extent, nor do we think you can legally compel him to spend all of his leisure time at home.

Miss F. E. E., Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and two children by such widow, the widow would receive dower of a one third interest for life in the real estate, and one third of the surplus, after payment of debts and expenses, of the personal property absolutely; we do not think the remarriage of the widow would affect her interest in the estate; we think proceedings to sell the real estate, belonging to an infant, would create an expense, and that if the infant is nearly of age it might, in some cases, be advisable to delay the sale until such time.

Mrs. D. W. B., Pennsylvania.—We do not think that, the fact that the property owned by your husband is subject to a mortgage, would in any way affect the validity of a will made by him, except that he can dispose of no greater interest in the property than he himself owns.

Mrs. A. F. S., Georgia.—We think that if you dispossess your tenant, such proceedings would break your lease and relieve your tenant from the future obligation thereunder, but that such proceedings would not relieve such tenant from the obligation for the payment of such rent as may be due you up to the time of the dispossess proceedings.

Mrs. L. K., Minnesota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that it is possible to word a deed for the purchase of real estate by a husband and wife, so that the whole property, upon the death of one, will become the sole property of the survivor; we can form no opinion, however, as to the particular deed you mention, without an examination of the same; we think you should have it examined by some local authority.

A. S., Mississippi.—If your debtor refuses to pay you, and if your note is now due, or over due, we think you should proceed against him to enforce the payment by an action in your local courts.

Mrs. W. H., Texas.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion, first, that it depends upon the terms of your lease as to just what repairs or improvements you can compel the landlord to put on property; second, we think that if your chickens trespass upon your neighbor's property and destroy his crop, he would be entitled to recover such damages from you as he suffered by reason thereof. Of course, if his crop is upon land for which you pay rent, and there is no agreement reserving his crop rights from your lease to this property, you might be entitled to recourse from the landlord by reason thereof; third, we think that your husband would be entitled to reasonable compensation from the person for whom he performed the service you mentioned. Just who this person is, your statements do not make clear to me; fourth, we think that your husband's claim for the money he loaned the negro would be against the negro himself and not against his employer, and that it would first be necessary for him to proceed against his debtor before he could try to recover monies due his debtor from someone else.

L. C., Iowa.—We are of the opinion that it depends upon the ingredients of your medicine or compound as to just what legal requirements would be necessary before marketing the same. We think in any event, if it contains drugs, it would be necessary to comply with the requirements of the Department of Agriculture under the Pure Food and Drug Act, and further requirements in case same contains certain drugs or contains alcohol. We think it advisable for you to take this matter up with some local authority with whom you can go in greater detail.

Mrs. E. T., Ashland, Ill.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that children may be disinherited by will, provided, of course, the testator possesses testamentary capacity, is not under undue influence and provided the will is legally drawn and executed and expresses his true intent.

Mrs. S. B. M., Waynesboro, Pa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, first, that children may be disinherited by will, but that such children would, of course, have the right to contest the will of a parent, in case the parent lacked testamentary capacity or if undue influence was exercised upon such parent in connection with the making of the will or if the will was not legally drawn or executed or did not comply with the law, or did not express the testator's true intent; second, under the laws of your state, upon the death of a married man leaving no will and leaving a widow and children or descendants, his widow would receive one third of the real estate for life and one third of the personal property absolutely, the balance going to his children in equal shares, the descendants of any deceased child taking the parent's share.

E. H. W., Fairfax, Mo.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion, that it depends upon facts not stated in your communication as to whether the sale of the land you mention conveyed good title. We think you should have the records examined to ascertain in just what manner this land was sold. We think the same could be sold legally in case your mother left a will naming the executor and giving him power of sale of same. We think also that in case she died intestate her minor heirs' interest in the land could have been legally disposed of in a proceeding brought for that purpose. As to just how this land was left and the manner in which the same was sold, you do not inform us and as above stated, we think you should have the records examined to ascertain this information. Of course, if your father only had an interest in this property and undertook to convey the whole title of the property, we think it quite probable that the present holder now has a defective title.

A Tramp's Philosophy

I've been round this country from Texas to Maine,
And mostly with nary a red;
I've walked it for miles in the wettest of rain,
And slept on a board for a bed.
But I've learnt a few comfortin' facts by the way,
While living this queeer life of mine,
And the principal one of the lot let me say,
Is, "It's better to whistle than whine."

I know that the Winter's a-comin' on fast,
I'm aware that a home I ain't got;
I see that the clothes I'm a-wearin' won't last
Till I reach a more torrider spot,
But nobody yet has discovered in me
Anxiety's tiniest sign;
And it's just 'cause I learnt in my youth, don't you see,
That "It's better to whistle than whine."

It strikes me somehow that it's mighty durn queer,
That fellers much wiser than me,
Keep kickin' because this terresteral sphere
Ain't jest what they want it to be,
Their parents have filled them with Latin and Greek,
But their logic ain't equal to mine,
Or else they would know every day in the week
That "It's better to whistle than whine."

Rock-a-bye

Baby is sleeping so cozy and fair,
While mother sits near, in her old oaken chair,
Her foot on the rocker the cradle she swings,
And though baby slumbers he hears what she sings:

CHORUS.

Rock-a-bye baby, on the treetop,
When the wind blows the cradle will rock,
When the bough breaks the cradle will fall
And down will come cradle, baby and all.
Rock-a-bye, rock-a-bye, mother is near,
Rock-a-bye, rock-a-bye, nothing to fear;
For angels of slumber are hovering near,
So rock-a-bye, rock-a-bye, mother is near.

Grandma sits rocking close by the fireplace,
With snowy white hair and a smile on her face;
The years have gone fast, yet it does not seem long
Since she rocked baby's papa to sleep with that song.
Dear little baby, there's joy and there's pride,
Long may it be so, whatever betide.
The kitchen, the cradle, in tender refrain,
Each echo in mem'ry that lullaby strain.

A Warrior Bold

In days of old, when knights were bold,
And barons held their sway,
A warrior bold, with spurs of gold,
Sang merrily his lay,
Sang merrily his lay;
"My love is young and fair,
My love hath golden hair,
And eyes so blue, and heart so true,
That none with her compare.
So what care I, though death be nigh,
I'll live for love or die,
So what care I, though death be nigh,
I'll live for love or die."
So this brave knight, in armor bright,
Went gayly to the fray:
He fought the fight, but ere the night,
His soul had pass'd away,
His soul had pass'd away.
The plighted ring he wore
Was crushed and wet with gore,
Yet ere he died he bravely cried:
"I've kept the vow I swore,
So what care I, though death be nigh,
I've fought for love and die,
So what care I, though death be nigh,
I've fought for love, I've fought for love,
I've fought for love, for love, for love I die."

—Edwin Thomas.

Sometime We'll Understand

Not now, but in the coming years,
It may be in a better land,
We'll read the meaning of our tears,
And there, sometime, we'll understand.

CHORUS.

Then trust in God through all thy days;
Fear not, for He doth hold thy hand;
Though dark thy way, still sing and praise;
Sometime, sometime, we'll understand.

We'll catch the broken threads again,
And finish what we here began;
Heaven will the mysteries explain,
And then, ah, then, we'll understand.

We'll know why clouds instead of sun,
Were over many a cherished plan;
Why song has ceased when scarce begun;
'Tis there, sometime, we'll understand.

Why what we long for most of all,
Eludes so oft our eager hands;
Why hopes are crushed and castles fall,
Up there, sometime, we'll understand.

God knows the way, He holds the key.
He guides us with unerring hand;
Sometime with tearless eyes we'll see;
Yes, there, up there, we'll understand.

YOU HAVE A BEAUTIFUL FACE

But Your Nose?

IN THIS DAY AND AGE attention to your appearance is an absolute necessity if you expect to make the most out of life. Not only should you wish to appear as attractive as possible, for your own self-satisfaction, which is alone well worth your efforts, but you will find the world in general judging you greatly, if not wholly, by your "looks," therefore it pays to "look your best" at all times.

Permit no one to see you looking otherwise; it will injure your welfare! Upon the impression you constantly make rests the failure or success of your life. Which is to be your ultimate destiny? My new Nose-Shaper, "Trados" (Model 22) corrects now ill-shaped noses without operation, quickly, safely and permanently. Is pleasant and does not interfere with one's daily occupation, being worn at night.

Write today for free booklet, which tells you how to correct ill-shaped noses without cost if not satisfactory.

Manners and Looks

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Flossie Baldwyn, Miss.—Your letter begins: "I am writing you in regard of how to catch a beaux," and basing our reply upon the other portions of your letter, we should say that it is not a "beaux" that you should catch, but a spelling-book. And when you catch it, Flossie, don't let it get away from you until you have conquered it from start to finish. This isn't etiquette, but it is what you need.

Bride-to-be, Podopholine, Tenn.—Orange blossoms in the bridal veil should be real, but if real ones cannot be had, the artificial will answer, as nobody can tell the difference except by examination. If the bride is in full wedding dress and veil, the groom must also wear the full regalia, day or evening, as the hour is. We extend our very best wishes.

Anxious, New Haven, Mo.—A fifteen-year-old girl's best etiquette is her mother.

Ignorant Miss, Noris, Ky.—The lady is not introduced to the gentleman, but the contrary, so you should not say you were introduced to a gentleman. In response to the usual "I am pleased to meet you," merely bowing will be enough, or "Thank you," if you feel you must say something. Of course, it is always proper to make any pleasant response that you think of, but most people are too stupid to think of anything original to say. When a traveling salesman introduces another to you, you should say something not stereotyped, for these Knights of the Road are always appreciative of novelties. Any bright young woman ought to be able to make an appropriate response without being told how.

Puzzled, Frankewing, Tenn.—When a gentleman is introduced to a lady she should speak first as recognizing the introduction, but introductions are so frequently made in such an informal manner that the niceties are not always observed, and it makes very little difference. Etiquette is not intended to make people stiff and formal, but easy and natural. (2) There is no particular "better age" for a girl to marry, but she should not marry until she is mentally and physically matured. This condition varies in different girls, and we may remark that some of them never do reach it.

Sadness, Nasaville, Tenn.—The man of twenty-four is younger than the woman of the same age, and if your young man doesn't realize this and is merely dallying along with you, it would be the part of wisdom for you firmly but respectfully to discontinue the affair. Possibly that might bring him to a realizing sense of your rights in the premises. Still, if he has to be shown, we think you would prefer a different kind of man as a life partner.

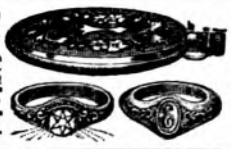
R. G., Elihu, Ky.—If you have to be taught out of a book how to act when you go to call on a lady, don't go. Books of etiquette have a value in a general way, but the finer details of association can only be acquired by practise. If you meet young ladies at church, or picnics, or dances, or any of the other social functions of the community, you will learn how to act properly and when you make a call you will act that way without reading it out of a book. A book you could read for general information in social matters is "Twentieth Century Etiquette." (2) When a gentleman is introduced to a lady he does not shake hands unless she offers her hand first.

A. A. G., Andover, S. Dak.—The United States is called Uncle Sam. (2) St. Peter's in Rome is generally credited with being the largest church in the world. (3) A shaving kit would be a suitable present next Christmas for the young man, though this is a little early for Christmas shopping. (4) It really is not proper to go home with a young man from an entertainment to which he might have taken you if he had cared to go to the trouble. By going home with him, you simply pardon his bad manners and selfishness.

Brown Eyes, Philadelphia, Pa.—A girl of sixteen or three of them, should be accompanied by a chaperon when going to a public skating-rink. Brother or father will answer if they attend to their duties. A public skating-rink is not the best place for a young girl, with, or without, a chaperon. (2) Before going to the party ask your mother what time you should come home and do what she says. (3) Written invitations ordinarily mean more formal affairs and they should be sent in sealed envelopes. For informal affairs among friends, almost any form of invitation—the phone is quite the thing these days—will not be objected to if a good time is promised.

Three, Kola, Miss.—Unless the lady is feeble and needs assistance to rise, it is not necessary for her escort to assist her when the minister asks the congregation to rise. (2) A girl of twenty should not have a calling beau if she does not know what to say when he tells her he has enjoyed her company. She might tell him it was more than she could truthfully say of his.

Miss L., Powell, Ky.—Ladies do not usually say anything to the gentlemen whom they do not want around expressive of their feelings, but they administer snubbing and underhand treatment which the gentleman of average comprehension will understand and not come around. If that treatment does not produce desired results, the lady may express herself frankly and end the acquaintance. Etiquette rules do not prescribe the proper language to be used on such a delicate occasion. Say what you please and as forcibly as you please, if it is a very stupid case. The real gentleman does not have to be told.



Snow Bird, Billsboo, N. C.—The gentlman may assist the lady to put on her rubbers, but she can better manage her gloves without his assistance. (2) As you were so careless as to leave your gloves at home on a cold night, it was polite of your escort to offer you his, and proper for you to accept them. (3) If the lady lets a gentleman wear a ring she loans him it makes no difference whose the ownership may be. The lady is responsible for the property. That is one reason we object to the exchange of rings. Would you like to see a ring of yours you had loaned a gentleman, on some other girl's finger? But it happens that way.

Lonely Wife, Dorchester, Texas.—Any person of human feeling, whether etiquette, or not, would suppose that your husband, after working away from home all week, would be only too glad to be at home Sunday with his wife and baby boy. He may love you, as he says he does, but he doesn't realize what love is, and we suggest to you that every Sunday, just as he starts off on his outing, you start off with the baby in another direction, taking a lunch along with you. If you are not at home when he gets back, no matter, let him be lonely for a while. It will do him good and we think two or three treatments of this kind will cure him of his outing habits and teach him the real value to him of his wife and baby. Don't quarrel with him, or complain, but cheerfully go your way for Sunday as he does for his. That's enough.

H. H. H., Great Falls, Mont.—As all the young people nearly who live in the country go to the local dances, there should be nothing improper in it. But if the dances are in town and you will meet all kinds of young men, most of them not the right kind, you are safer at home. At the country dances we have known, everybody knew everybody else and everything was all right. (2) The best dances that a young girl can dance are those for which she doesn't have to educate her modesty in modern manners, before she can dance them. Before dancing any of the newer dances, look at them for a while and if they jar your delicacy, don't learn to dance them, because it is merely teaching your modesty to be callous. (3) A seventeen-year-old girl, out of school, may have a Sunday caller, if her mother does not object.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

Grass stains can be removed from white material by washing the stained garments in spirits of camphor.

To remove ink stains, soak the spot in sweet milk. As soon as milk gets dark, change and use fresh.

To make lamp chimney and tumblers stronger, boil them for a couple of minutes in water.
MRS. E. H. IRON, Minn.

When I bake pies or cakes I take my pancake turner and slip it under the pans to put them in and take them out of the oven and thus I seldom burn my fingers.

Here is a recipe for quarreling. Take a root of sassafras and steep in a pint of water and put in a bottle. When your husband is in a quarrelsome mood, fill your mouth with this and hold it there till he goes away or is better natured. A sure cure.
MRS. G. C. MCLAUGHLIN, Oil City, Pa.

Here is a good washing fluid. At a drug-store get two ounces salts of tartar, two ounces of carbonated ammonia, one pound of borax and a can of good lye. Put in a stone jar and add four quarts of water. Take one cup of this solution and put in boiler of water, add half cake of washing soap, wet clothes and put in boiler and boil. They will not require rubbing unless very soiled.

BLACK INK. (Requested.)—Gather oak balls before they get hard, usually the last of July or the first of August, from green oaks. Press out the juice, strain through cheese-cloth into a can, drop in a dozen rusty iron nails and let stand in can two days. Strain and add a small amount of alcohol. I have some made twenty years ago and it is good yet.
MRS. HARRIET POOL, Yreka, Cal.

Remedies

To cure headache, take a teaspoon of cinnamon with water.
MRS. E. H. IRON, Minn.

BOILS.—Draw to head with a poultice of soap and sugar. Also is effective on corns.

When baby is constipated, give a teaspoon of sweet cream. This is a fine remedy.
MRS. B. T. OSBORNE, Vedalia, Ga.

CATARRH OF STOMACH.—Buy ten cents' worth of gum arabic, and let a small piece dissolve in the mouth five or six times a day.

RUSTY NAIL WOUNDS.—Immerse wound in hot strong salt water, then smoke with wool or woolen rags for half an hour; after this apply equal parts of turpentine and lard and bind with a clean white cloth. Equally good for any form of blood poison.
FANNIE V. TIDD, New York, N. Y.

Requests

How to can mixed vegetables for soup.

Cure for epileptic fits.
MRS. NOVA ALCORN, New Liberty, Mo.

The poem, "Tommy's Prayer."
MRS. W. C. BEEWER, Bennett, N. C.

Will some sister send me the book entitled, "Anne of the Island." I will return favor.
MABEL HENDRICKSON, Iron, Minn.

Mrs. John F. Wisler, Salona, P. O. Box 34, Pa., would like the July, August and September numbers of COMFORT for year 1915.

Mrs. C. C. Bates, Castalian Springs, Tenn. would like to hear from someone who has taken the milk diet. Will return postage.

Mrs. L. M. Cook, Otwell, Box 80, Ark., would like the name of "the liquid and bright specks" used on crepe flowers; also address of the "Illustrated Companion."

Will someone please send me all of last year's papers, beginning with the March number of COMFORT. Will return favor any way I can.
MRS. C. A. WOODROUGH, Moore Haven, Fla.

Mrs. C. I. Simmers, Hildebrand, Oregon, would like poem containing the lines:

"Yan's old man owned a lottery shack,
Restaurant front and game out back;
Sat at his desk and glared through his specs,
At the guide's and tourist's rubber necks."

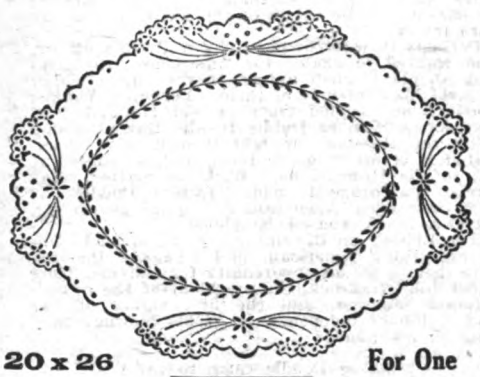
Girl's Waterproof Cape

A Great PROTECTOR From WIND and RAIN



Premium No. 5297

Made of striped rubberized cloth with suitable lining, and the best feature of this cape is the hood. Girls going to school do not like to carry an umbrella, and this cape can be worn either in hot or cold weather. If in winter a sweater or coat can be worn underneath, and the child is not only dry but perfectly warm. There are two openings in the cape for the arms, but the garment is large enough so the books or packages can be carried underneath, which makes it much better than a Rain Coat. The shoulders are shaped so as to give it a very attractive look. This cape comes in a very dark drab color with lighter drab stripes. They are so pretty any girl will be proud to wear one. Sizes 6 to 14 years. When ordering better order it larger than necessary so to have it of sufficient size to go over a heavy coat or other garments. Boys can easily get up clubs and thus get one of these Rain Capes for their sisters. Girls like to get subscribers to COMFORT where they can so easily earn such a sensible premium so as to keep warm and dry during the rainy season. When ordering be sure to mention size wanted. It comes in sizes from 6 to 14 years.

Special Club Offer. For a club of only seven one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you by parcel post one of these serviceable Rain Capes. State size wanted. Premium No. 5297.

A Handsome Tray Cloth

20 x 26 Inches — Premium No. 7841 — For One Subscription

We call the above one of the handsomest designs in a tray-cloth we have yet seen to say nothing of its large size, which is 20 x 26 inches and yet in spite of its size it does not require an unusual amount of work to finish it. The stitches themselves are simple as it may be worked either in solid or eyelet embroidery with buttonhole edge. It looks the neatest when worked all in white, although one or more colors may be used if desired. This extra large, attractive tray-cloth comes stamped on pure white "Butcher cloth" which in reality is very fine linen finished cotton—a material which has the appearance of pure linen and will if anything give longer service. We will make you a present of this tray-cloth upon the terms of one of the following special offers.

Offer 7841A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25c we will send you this handsome tray-cloth free by parcel post prepaid.

Offer 7841B. For your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25c and 10c additional (35c in all) we will send you this tray-cloth free by parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7841.

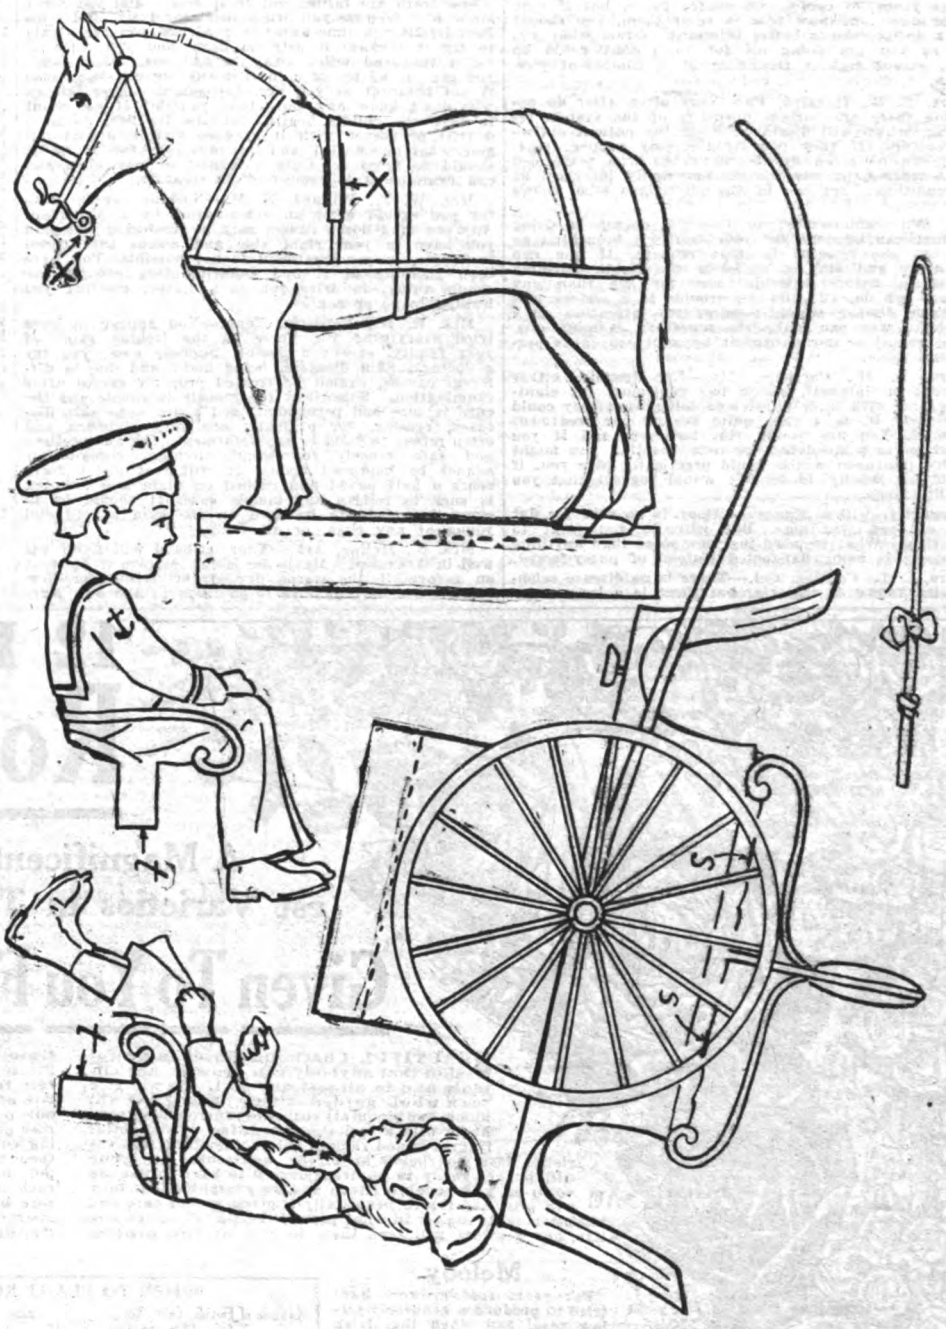
Children's Happy Hour

Chub, the Pet Pony

Copyright, 1917 by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

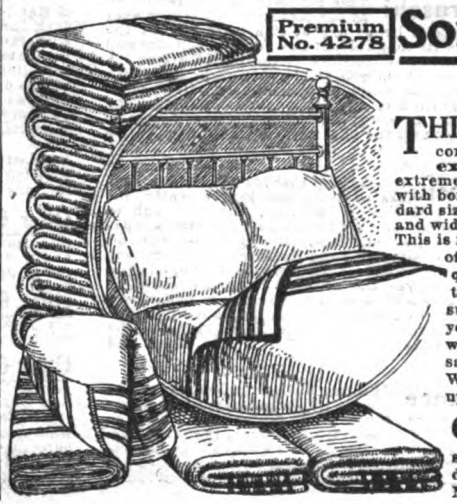
SOME little children like dogs better than any other kind of pets, others prefer kitten, or squirrels or rabbits, but Tom and Della just dearly loved Shetland ponies. They didn't have one either, for their parents were not rich, but every night they prayed for one and every morning they looked anxiously out to see if it had come while they were sleeping. They never doubted for an instant that it would come and resolved to do everything in their power to deserve it. They always cheerfully gave the coziest chairs in the house to grandma and grandpa and other visitors, and they never yelled out loud or made noise when older folks were trying to talk nor made a fuss about going to bed or getting dressed up or taking medicine or things like that. Of course they loved to romp and run outdoors and indeed they made plenty of noise, too, which is natural enough and quite proper for tots when they are at play, but once inside, I just wish you could see how nicely they behaved. Not once did they forget to say, "Thank you," when things were passed to them at mealtime nor "Please," when they wanted a second helping.



All this time, in a distant city, was a sad, lonely pony by the name of "Chub," who longed to have a little girl and boy for his masters. Chub's owner was a harsh, brutal man and made him haul heavy loads of coal and wood all day and beat him cruelly if he paused to get a breath. He loved children because they patted his thick mane and fed him apples and candy and, sometimes, when the big man would let a youngster sit on the seat and drive, Chub was as happy as he could be. One sultry evening after he had worked even harder than usual, his thoughtless driver locked him in the rickety stable and never gave him anything to eat or drink. Poor Chub whinnied and whinnied but all in vain. Presently it began to rain and he could hear the cool water splashing into the barrel that was just outside his stall window. This made him frantic to quench his thirst, and he pressed against the door to get out and was overjoyed to find that it was not locked. The rope, by which he was tied, held him fast only a little while for his teeth were strong and sharp and he easily chewed it through. Once free he took a long, delicious drink of the fresh water and felt much better. Slowly he ambled away, eating grass where he could find it along the ditches and by morning he had reached a dense woods where it would be very hard for anyone to find him. At first he thought it would be nice to stay there and be perfectly free, but he soon became lonesome and he also missed his regular feed of grain and hay, and he resolved to go further and seek a real home. I cannot say how long he traveled, but it must have been weeks, and the soft grass of the meadows and the growing grain he had munched had made him sleek and fat. Now Tom and Della were so sure of having their prayers answered that they had actually fixed one corner of the barn for their dream pony and every night when a storm threatened they left the door open. On a certain cloudy night a storm did come and the thunder and lightning were fearful. Chub was lonesome and scared and he found the open door and snuggled in. In the morning the children found him and were overjoyed. He was just as glad as they, and before noon their uncle had fixed up a cart and harness and he was trotting merrily before them. After three days of perfect bliss the bad man came to claim him and Chub shivered all over and the children wept.

"What do you use the pony for?" asked their father.

"To haul coal," answered the man.



"He is not strong enough for that, but I will give you a horse, that is, if you leave him with us," offered their daddy.

After some delay the offer was accepted and now you can see Tom and Della riding in their pony cart any nice day. But really, don't you think the dear little souls deserve their good luck?

Pony Cart Cut-Out Directions

Tom and Della have a dear little pony and a brand new cart and they want you to put it together and see how they look in it. The first thing to do is to paste the entire picture on a smooth piece of cardboard, using cooked flour paste, and dry it for at least two hours in the middle of a big book. You next cut out each of the five objects and color them with crayons, chalk or paint. The pony will stand if you bend the long strip under him at the dotted line. The shafts of the cart go in and out of the slots "x." The girl and boy sit back to back. The extending flaps "t," "t" fit into the slots "s," "s." The whip may be inserted into the slot "s" also, in the front seat.

Large Shaggy Teddy Bear

The Best Playmate A Boy or Girl Ever Had

10 Inches High And Full Jointed

FOR A CLUB OF THREE!

EVERY little boy and girl wants a Teddy Bear and here is an opportunity for every father or mother who reads COMFORT to get one without expense. "Teddy" looks exactly as you see him in the picture above. He is a big shaggy fellow, 10 inches tall, made of rich, handsome brown plush, paws lined with felt, carefully stitched and finished and his head, arms and legs are jointed in such a manner that you can place him in almost any position. He will stand up, sit up, stand on his head, go on all four feet, in fact, you can make him assume all kinds of positions that are so comical and lifelike that it makes the children scream with delight just to look at him. "Teddy" is so well made that no matter how roughly he is handled he cannot become broken and with ordinary care should last for years. We will send you "Teddy" free if you will accept the following special Club Offer. For three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you this big shaggy Teddy Bear free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 6993.

8 Wheel Chairs in March

403 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The eight March wheel chairs go to the following applicants to bring a ray of sunshine into their dreary lives. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

Madie Hanis, Middleton, Tenn., 200; Virgil Huff, R. R. 1, Grant City, Mo., 128; John Clark, Cedar Grove, Ind., 117; J. R. Claxton, Buffalo Gap, Texas, 108; Lottie Berry, Ellenwood, Ga., 102; Mrs. Lyman T. Carter, Eureka, Utah, 101; Mrs. Nina Beach, Buckhorn, N. Mex., 92; Tavie Culpepper, Lake Park, Ga., 91.

Madie Hanis, age 16, is crippled by tuberculosis of the bone from which she has suffered a long time. The disease has progressed so that she has not been able to walk the past year.

Virgil Huff, age 15, is so paralyzed that he has not walked or talked during the last eight years. His mother's health is broken by taking care of him and she expects the wheel chair will be a great help to her and comfort to the boy.

John Clark, a little crippled boy who is almost helpless. Miss Hilda Doerflien sent the entire 117 subscriptions for his chair all in one bunch.

J. R. Claxton, age 33, crippled the last four years by broken back, is much in need of a wheel chair. Has wife and two children.

Lottie Berry, age 17, crippled from birth and is almost helpless. Her mother, who has eight children and does all her own work wrote me; "If anybody in the world needs a wheel chair it is Lottie, and you don't know how it will be appreciated."

Mrs. Carter, age 30, widow, is almost helpless as the result of spinal trouble and is in great need of the wheel chair.

Mrs. Beach, age 43, is crippled by rheumatism so that she has not been able to walk for four years. She has a husband and four children.

Tavie Culpepper, age 10, is crippled from her hips down, caused by typhoid fever seven years ago.

Remember that I have a host of other shut-in applicants that need your help to get them wheel chairs. Don't neglect them this month. Let us get as many as possible out into the April sunshine.

We have a fine Roll of Honor this month. Your name would look well there next month.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

COMFORT Wheel Chair Far Nicer Than She Expected

COLUMBIA, N. C.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I received little Millie Catherine's chair Feb. 3rd., in good condition, charges all prepaid, and I wish to extend my sincere thanks and heartfelt gratitude to you for so nice a chair, and also to each and every one who so kindly helped me to get it. It is much nicer than I expected or scarcely dared hope for, and dear little Catherine is perfectly delighted with it. She seemed to understand from the very first sight of it that it was hers, and will point it out and beg to be rolled in it. It will be such a comfort to her and a great help to me. It arrived just three days before her birthday, Feb. 6th, so I call it her birthday present, and it surely is a grand one.

May you live long to send out many more chairs to poor little helpless children and shut-ins. I will send you little Catherine's picture in her chair soon as I can get one. Thanking you again, I am,

Most gratefully yours, MRS. A. W. BARNES.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Mrs. C. R., Newman, Cal.—There is no cancer remedy yet discovered in all the research of all the scientists who have been, and still are, trying to find one. Cancer is one of the twelve leading causes of death by disease in this country and is on the increase, having risen from sixty-three per one hundred thousand of population to about eighty in 1815.

M. G., Owingsville, Ky.—You say you suffer severe pains in the side when you walk or ride or work, even when you laugh, and you have suffered these pains for a long time, but have never seen a doctor because when the doctor was around you were not suffering and didn't say anything to him about it. Now, suppose instead of asking a doctor a thousand miles away to guess at what is wrong while you are suffering, you go to your doctor at home when you are not suffering and get his advice and proper treatment. There may be nothing serious, but there may be, and the longer you wait the worse it will become.

Mrs. M., Bear Lake, Mich.—Your doctor was right about pimples going away of themselves, and there was no cure for them, but those are the pimples on the skin of young people. Pimples that continue after full maturity come from different causes and are usually some form of skin disease, like acne. Just what causes yours, of course, we cannot guess, but if your doctor does not know how to treat them, you should find a doctor who is better informed. From what you tell us you are doing all for them that could be done, except regular treatment by a competent physician.

Mrs. E. R., Hazzard, Pa.—Very often after an operation there are various disorders of the system resulting, which will disappear when the patient entirely recovers. If they persist, the only proper treatment can be given by the physician who performed the operation, or one who is thoroughly informed as to condition. See one of the physicians who knows your case.

T. W., Summerville, S. C.—The doctor is doing all that can be done for your mother's bronchitis as long as she remains in that climate. If she can get away and stay a while in the North Carolina highlands, nature will do more for her than any doctors can do. (2) Bladder trouble is a serious and stubborn disease which requires the attention of a physician who can make the necessary examinations. Home remedies and treatment by mail are of no permanent value.

Mrs. B. M., Carthage, Mo.—Eye trouble, either external or internal, which has continued for eighteen years, with three physicians doing what they could to remedy it, is a case quite beyond our treatment by mail. You are young yet, however, and if you would go to a specialist, or to a hospital, you might receive treatment which would practically cure you, if it did not wholly do so. We would suggest that you try St. Louis.

Inquirier, Miller, Kansas.—There is no cure for flat feet of long standing. But why do you want to cure them? What we need just now more than anything in people is being flat-footed instead of pussy-footed.

Mrs. L. T., Corning, Cal.—There is no disease scientifically known as malaria, but there is a large number of ailments which are given that name. Climatic conditions may be malarial and many disorders result, usually called malaria in the patient. But as there is no specific malaria there is no specific medicine and you must see a doctor and find out what really is the matter before any treatment can be suggested.

W. C. B., Cresskill, N. J.—As cataract of the eye is to be remedied only by a surgical operation and it is entirely within the eye, we can hardly recommend goose grease as a remedy. Did the person who told you that goose grease was good for cataract have any idea what cataract is?

H. T., Cullman, Ala.—Making a long distance guess at what troubles your throat we should say from the symptoms you give, that some foreign substance may be imbedded there, or some abrasion of the surface which the usual sore-throat remedies will not reach. Suppose you have a doctor make an examination to find out definitely what is wrong.

D. W. W., San Francisco, Cal.—If the excessive perspiration has been with you always, that is your natural condition, and it would be injurious to your health to prevent it. If it is the result of other causes, and nervousness sometimes has that effect, it should be rendered normal, but nothing can be done until the cause is known. To learn that, you must consult a physician personally.

B. F. A., Louisville, Ky.—Thanks for information, but we know several people who wear cotton socks, or stockings, and never wore wool, who are troubled with perspiring feet. The average foot is less liable to excessive perspiration when in cotton than in wool, and many who wear wool would be relieved if they wore cotton, but cotton alone is no cure for a real case of perspiring feet.

Mrs. M. H., Cadillac, Mich.—Wens are not to be absorbed by application of medicine, but by massaging. Some so-called small wens are absorbed, or dissipated, by a sharp blow from a mallet. If those on your head are so small that they never trouble, except when you get to thinking about them, perhaps you had better stop thinking about them until they grow large enough to make you think. Then take them to a doctor for treatment.

M. E. W., Bremen, Ga.—Evidently the child has nasal catarrh, and now is the time to cure it if at all but not by home remedies, patent medicines, or your own ignorance. Have a good doctor, who knows more about catarrh than your previous one, to examine the child thoroughly and prescribe properly for it. Maybe it can be cured in that climate and maybe not, but the longer you put it off, the more difficult it will become.

Mrs. A. K., River Rouge, Mich.—You are another one of those mothers who shouldn't try to raise children. Here you have a child over two years old whose teeth are falling out from decay, and you don't know why because you brush them carefully, and some friend tells you lime-water is good and you are afraid to try it because it may do harm and you come to us, a thousand miles away to find out. Why don't you get the advice of a local dentist or physician who is not ignorant as you are, instead of asking friends who don't know any more than you do? If you want to save the child's health, perhaps its life, go to a dentist or doctor with it at once and have him tell you what is needed and to prescribe for it as it should be treated. Only a dentist or physician who can examine it is competent to treat it.

Mrs. W. T., Willard, N. M.—Nothing can be done for you except after an examination by a physician. Any one of a dozen causes may be producing the pain you have in your right side and unless that cause is known, proper treatment is not possible. You have been guessing at it and suffering long enough, we should think, to drive you to a doctor, whether you wanted to go or not.

Mrs. E. M., Newbern, Tenn.—You appear to have tried everything you knew on the itching skins of your family, except a doctor. Suppose now, you try a doctor. Skin diseases, being many and due to different causes, cannot be treated properly except after examination. Sometimes the remedy is simple and the cure is sure and permanant, and again some skin diseases, eczema, for example, are very stubborn and often refuse to yield to any treatment. As an excellent and safe remedy for simple itching, cocoa-butter cannot be improved upon. It will cost about forty cents a half pound and rubbed on night and morning is sure to relieve any simple case. It should be in every household to be used on the skin of old and young at any time, or all times.

Mrs. S., McRae, Ark.—Your husband will never get well in Arkansas. Maybe he might improve if he went on a farm in the warm, dry air of Arizona or New Mexico, but he will have to go there to find out. Anyway, he cannot possibly be worse off than where he now is. That is the only advice we can give under the circumstances.

COMFORT Reader, Paterson, N. J.—Many people are subject to flushing of the face and redness and burning of the skin when coming in out of the cold, but most of them have so many other worse troubles that they do not bother about it. Unless it is your normal condition, you may find a remedy, but you will first have to find out what the cause is. Possibly you are nervous, or over-conscious, or high-tempered. Are you?

Young Mother, Polkton, N. C.—If you have indigestion, as your doctors have told you, you need not be surprised at having almost everything else disagreeable, or at least think you have, as dyspepsia acts that way. The gas on your stomach gives you the heart pain and the gas comes from fermentation of the food you eat, instead of assimilation of it, which latter is what it should do. Prevention, not cure, is the rule to follow, and you should prevent indigestion by eating digestible food. That you must learn by dieting yourself and refusing to eat what will hurt you, however much you may like it. Begin on a diet of eggs, rice, cooked fruit, brown bread, or hard toast, no red meats—lamb and chicken may be eaten sparingly—drink no tea or coffee, but plenty of water though not at meals. Watch your diet closely and add to it or take from it, as you feel good or bad results, and never swallow a mouthful until it is chewed to a pulp. There are numerous dyspeptics who are troubled with their digestion in spite of all that can be done, but you may not be one of these. Indigestion is the result of nervousness in some people, but in more, nervousness is the result of indigestion. It is not what the doctor does for such a patient that counts most, but what the patient does for himself, or herself. So it is largely up to you. (2) As to the worms, ask your doctor about them, as they don't seem to be amenable to treatment by mail.

Mrs. L. K., Witt, Ill.—Six years ago is when you should have taken your baby to a doctor for her difficult breathing, but you chose to treat her yourself, and now at seven, she is in a serious condition from what might have been cured long ago. Take her to a doctor at once.

"Yankee Doodle"

UNLESS we except "Dixie," "Yankee Doodle" is probably the most popular national song we have, and it is the oldest too. We have been using it since 1775, and yet there is considerable doubt as to where we got it. They made a search at the library of Congress several years ago and more than a dozen different theories about the origin of the words and music were found.

Perhaps it was composed by a British officer, who wanted to shame the Americans, and who took an old English nursery rhyme, upon which to mold his contempt of them. Perhaps "Yankee Doodle" was copied from an old Holland harvest song, "Yankee Diddle Doodle Down." Some think the Hessians brought it over with them, and it is credited to the Irish, and, strangest of all, to the Hungarians. Well, no matter what foreign parentage it had, "Yankee Doodle" is now thoroughly American, and quite grown up, after a much abused babyhood.

The British, in Revolutionary times, made fun of everything American, and "Yankee Doodle" gave them quite an opportunity for ridicule. They hated John Hancock, the president of the constitutional congress, and the first signer of the declaration of independence. This is what they sang in his honor:

"Yankee Doodle came to town
For to buy a firelock;
We will tar and feather him,
And so we will John Hancock."

They complimented Mrs. Hancock as well, in the following words:

"Madam Hancock dreamt a dream,
She dreamt she wanted something;
She dreamt she wanted a Yankee king
To crown him with a pumpkin."

12 Everblooming Rose Bushes

A Magnificent Collection Of The Newest Varieties In The Most Beautiful Colors

Given To You For A Club Of Two!

BEAUTIFUL Charming Roses in profusion that anybody can grow in any climate and in almost any soil. We will give you a whole garden of them free and they will bloom and bloom all summer, surrounding your home with a veritable paradise of delightful fragrance and radiant colors. The different varieties described below are strong, well-rooted one-year old bushes ready to be transplanted to your garden as soon as you receive them and we guarantee that they will grow and thrive beautifully if given proper care and attention. No matter in what part of the United States you live, our growers will send them to you at the proper time to plant according to the schedule printed below. Please remember, however, that these dates may vary from ten to fifteen days in event of an extremely early or late spring, so you need not become anxious if they should not reach you just on the date named in schedule. The rose growers who supply us are perfectly familiar with planting conditions in your locality and you may depend upon them to forward the roses to you at the best time for you to put them in the ground. Following is a brief description of each of the different varieties of beautiful ever-blooming rose bushes given you free on this great offer. Complete instructions on how to plant and care for roses will be included free of charge.

Melody

For years rose growers have tried to produce a genuinely yellow rose, and when this Irish beauty was introduced, it was hailed with delight for it represented a new color in its class and has now become the greatest of all yellow roses for the home planter. It grows to perfection in any ordinary garden soil in all localities and from the time it is planted in the early spring, it bears continuously great numbers of lovely flowers of immense size, which stand out well from the plant, giving it a regal appearance and stamping it as the most extraordinary rose of its color. The color is a lovely shade of yellow, deepening to apricot in the center; in fact, it is a rose of sterling merit, which has proved hardy in all localities.

Frau Karl Druschi

This brilliant rose is renowned as the best snow-white rose ever produced. The foliage is heavy and of rich texture; but the glory of this plant, is its magnificent flowers, huge in size and produced with the greatest freedom on long stiff stems. A single plant will produce hundreds of bloomers, which are full, very deep and double. The color is marvelously white, positively without a suggestion of any tint or shade of color. The fragrance is exquisite; in short this glorious Rose seems to have been endowed with all the charms and grace of the entire rose family.

Maiden's Blush

A beautiful rose for bedding or decorated purposes just recently introduced. It is very vigorous and healthy, hardy enough to withstand all climates and quickly forming a handsome shapely bush the first season planted. It will thrive in most any soil or situation, clothing itself with beautiful ornamental foliage and having the vitality necessary to produce the handsome double flowers all through the season. Everyone exclaims over its exquisite beauty and after having seen it in bloom, we can well appreciate their enthusiasm. The delicate blendings of colors is almost impossible to describe, rose tints in the center of the flower gradually shading off into pale blush and creamy white.

Etoile De France

This rose has been selected from the almost unlimited number of hardy red roses, because it seems the acme of perfection. The bush grows upright, covered with beautiful, bronzy, green foliage, which is not subject to insect attack. The growth is so luxuriant and lusty that great masses of beautiful crimson roses are borne all summer. This is one of the finest of all garden roses.

Radiance

This wonderful new everblooming rose is one of the most beautiful varieties ever introduced. We want every lover of beautiful roses to plant Radiance for there is no other like it, either in color, growth, or beauty. It is the ideal garden rose, thriving in practically any soil under the most adverse conditions to a perfection seen in no other rose. The splendid flowers are produced in amazing profusion. They are immense in size, and the color is a beautiful blending of shades of carmine rose with opal and coppery reflections, extremely brilliant in effect, exquisitely beautiful but most difficult to describe. Radiance is the premier garden rose of today, and its numerous charms will delight you.

Red Dorothy Perkins

This is the most valuable addition to the popular class of Rambler roses ever produced. Its magnificent foliage is fine, dark and glossy, remaining intact to unseasonable weather and withstanding all diseases. This quality alone assures an ornamental climber which is nearly evergreen and its graceful pendulous habit will place it first among pillar roses. The marvelous production of bloom is really sensational; it is produced in great clusters; each individual rose being perfect in form and very double, the color being deep intense scarlet which retains its vivid brilliancy as long as the flower lasts.

OUR GUARANTEE

THESE roses are all strong healthy plants on their own roots and will be packed in damp moss and sent to you by Parcel Post prepaid so that you will be sure to receive them in just as good condition as when they left the greenhouse. You may accept this offer with the perfect assurance that these beautiful ever-blooming roses will grow and develop into rare specimen beauties. If any fail to grow we hereby guarantee to replace them for you free of all cost.

Comfort's Comicalities "Jest for Fun"

Something Coming to Him

Two of the clock, and a cold and chilly night. The wind whistled eerily round the corners of the streets, and the sky overhead was clouded and threatening. A policeman coming steadily along, saw a suspicious-looking man loafing about outside a certain house. For some time he watched, and then determined to solve the mystery.

"Here, you!" he said, advancing suddenly, "whatcher hanging about this house for?"

The loafer turned his weary eyes on the questioner as he replied:

"I'm only waiting for the lady inside to get to sleep, Constable. We're married."

A Lovable Woman

The young doctor and his friend, the drug clerk, were sitting at the club window when a richly dressed woman passed, the Indianapolis Star relates.

"There goes the only woman I ever loved," the young M. D. sighed.

"So?" the other asked. "Then why don't you marry her?"

"Can't afford it," the doctor replied; "she's my best patient."

Perfect Fit

"Yes, grandma, I am to be married during the bright and gladsome spring."

"But my dear," said grandma, earnestly, "you are very young. Do you feel that you are fitted for married life?"

"I am being fitted now, grandma," explained the prospective bride sweetly. "Seventeen gowns!"

Why Not?

Jimmie giggled when the teacher read the story of the man who swam across the Tiber three times before breakfast.

"You do not doubt that a trained swimmer could do that, do you?"

"No, sir," answered Jimmie, but I wonder why he did not make it four and get back to the side where his clothes were."—Awgwan.

Served Him Right

"I admit I was found in the possession of firearms," said the prisoner. But it's only a joke of mine, my lord."

"Explain yourself," said the Magistrate.

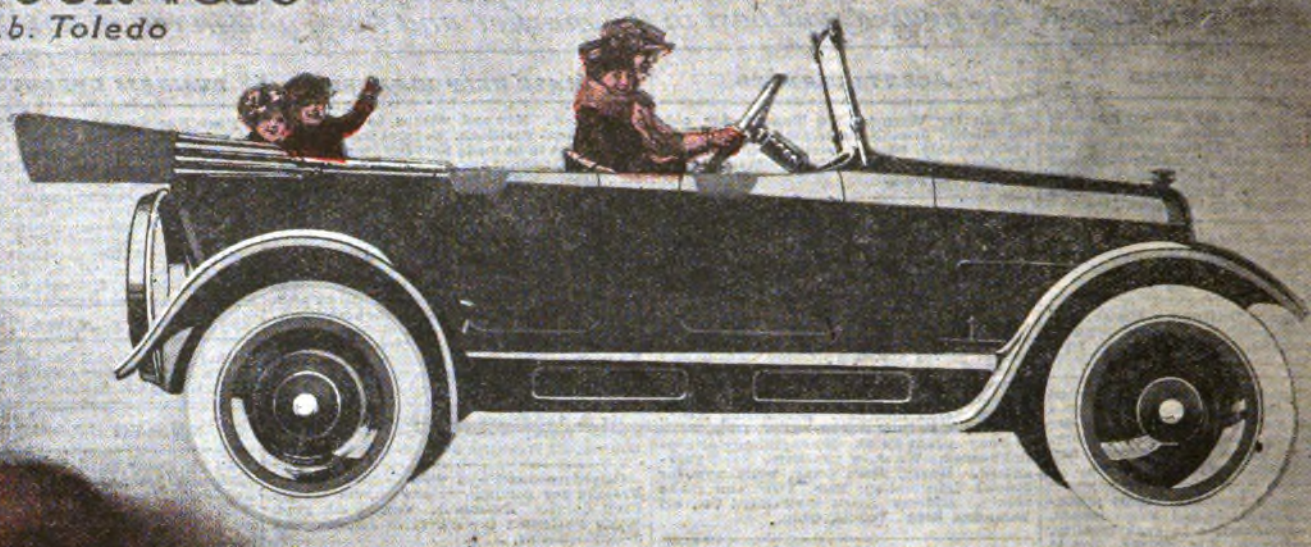
"Why, I put two pistols in my pocket when I go out to a friendly gathering. Then I start talking of aeroplanes."

"Well?"

"Then I say my life was once saved by parachutes."

"Yes."

"And then I pull out the pistols and say, 'Pair o' shoots,' Ha, ha! See?"



PAIR O' SHOOTS

"Yes, I see. Did you make that joke yourself?"

"Yes, my lord."

"Two years' hard labor!"—Tit-Bits.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

United States Enters the Great Conflict to Rid the World of the Curse of Military Despotism

WE are now at war with the enemy of mankind. The conflict was not of our seeking. We did all that we could to avoid it without sacrificing our national honor. War was forced upon us by that military despotism which is striving by the most cruel means in defiance of the law of nations and the common rights of humanity to subject the world to its tyrannical will. Long and patiently had we suffered destruction of lives and property which it had treacherously instigated and executed in our midst through its spies and diplomatic representatives; it had secretly attempted to induce Mexico and Japan to join it in war against us by promise of helping them to conquer and permanently hold a part of our territory; and finally, when its armed forces engaged in open hostilities against us we could not do otherwise than resort to arms, for there was no other means of defense.

President Wilson stated the situation correctly when, before Congress on the second day of April, he asserted that by the indiscriminate sinking of the peaceful ships of all nations the German government was waging war against all nations, against mankind. He was right in saying that submarines are outlaws when used as Germany has used them against merchant ships, and especially in causing the slaughter of men, women and children who were passengers on such ships, and that the situation, aggravated by a long series of plots and intrigues against our peace and safety, had become unbearable. He was absolutely right in charging that a state of war already had been thrust upon the government and people of the United States by the German government, and he was in duty bound to ask, as he did, that Congress recognize that fact by a formal declaration and provide the means "to bring the German government to terms and end the war."

The President draws a sharp distinction between the German people, with whom he says we have no quarrel, and their autocratic government which he accuses of having swept them into the world war without their previous knowledge or approval. For the German people he expresses friendship and sympathy and the hope that they will soon follow the recent example of the Russian people by establishing a democratic government in place of the despotism which now oppresses them and is a pest to the peace-loving democracies of the world. He is convinced that "Prussian autocracy could never be our friend," that "no autocratic government could be trusted to keep faith," and that "a steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained except by a partnership of democratic nations." "We are about to accept the gage of battle with this natural foe to liberty," he declares, "to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its people, the German people included."

There are hopeful indications that many of the people in Germany are beginning to see the matter in much the same light as the President views it, and are likely to take the reins of government in their own hands as a step toward peace. The sooner they do it the better, for England, France and Russia, like the United States, have resolved never to make peace with Prussian militarism.

In England and Italy government by the people is as complete and as firmly established as in America, for the kings and nobles which these countries still retain to gratify their love of pomp and pageantry are mere puppets long since shorn of all governmental power. Autocratic government is a survival of the dark ages and is out of joint with twentieth century ideals. The people of Russia have swept it away and have emerged into the light of freedom under the energizing stimulus of war. Germany and her allies are the only European nations over which autocratic rulers hold sway, and their thrones are tottering.

It is a world-wide conflict of autocracy against democracy that we have entered, and it cannot end until the curse of military despotism is wiped off the face of the earth. The issue is vital to the most sacred rights and broadest interests of humanity and there can be no compromise. In order to give substantial foundation to the hope that this is to be the last great war it must be fought to a finish whereby permanent peace shall be assured in the establishment of government of the people, by the people and for the people in every civilized country.

Through the ages war has been the price paid by humanity for every important upward step. World conditions that stood as obstacles in the path of progress and could not otherwise be removed made the present war inevitable sooner or later. It has come in our time and we must bear our share of the burden. Do not credit the pessimistic prediction that this war, unspeakably frightful though its devastation be, will be a setback to civilization. It will purge the world and clear the way for a new and better order of things. The cause of liberty will be triumphant throughout Christendom, it will bring universal religious tolerance, it will end forever the bloody and barbarous reign of the degenerate Turk. Europe, chastened and poorer in things material will be richer spiritually while the leveling of caste will broaden and strengthen the bond of human interest and sympathy between the social classes.

And we Americans will be bettered by the lessons we shall learn and the sacrifices we shall have to make. Thrilled with patriotism and aroused to a deep sense of devotion we shall place service above greed; constrained by necessity we shall learn to eliminate waste for which we are notorious as a people, thrift will take the place of extravagance, and the seriousness of the work before us will have a sobering influence and turn our thoughts and aims to something better and higher than the mere pursuit of pleasure, and not the least of our benefits will be the national blessing of uniting the various elements of our diversified population in a common cause, a common interest and a common purpose.

Military Necessity that the Farmers Raise Large Crops as Possible

THERE is a world-wide shortage of food that, unless relieved by larger and better harvests the coming season in America, threatens higher prices and short rations for the people and serious difficulty to the government in carrying on the war. It has assumed the proportions of a national crisis, and to meet it the government has supplemented the general movement for the planting of vacant city lots and back-yard and school gardens with an urgent appeal to the farmers to do their utmost to raise as large crops as possible this season as a patriotic duty under stress of military necessity. The military experts on both sides agree in the opinion that the war has reached a stage in which the determining factors are food and ships—food for the people, food for the armies in the field, freight ships to transport the food and war-ships to convoy and protect them from submarines.

Although we are to raise a large army to join the forces that are fighting the Germans on French soil, it will not be drilled and equipped for service under a year. Meanwhile France and England have as many soldiers in the field as they can feed under present conditions, and the food problem, both for their armies and for their civil population in those two countries, is becoming more difficult. Neither country is self-sustaining in time of peace, and now that so many of their men are engaged in the pursuit of war the farming there is carried on largely by women and children, which has resulted in diminished food production. The deficiency has been and must continue to be supplied mostly from America. Our phenominally large harvest of 1915 rendered this an easy and profitable task last year, but the short harvest of last year together with the loss of so many ships sunk by submarines makes it a troublesome proposition at present. The German and Austrian ships which we have taken over with those we have and others we are building, and the defensive activities of our navy are confidently relied on to care for the transportation question satisfactorily. So the basic question of winning the war comes back to the American farmers.

The American farmers never have failed and never will fail of patriotic devotion. They are not asked now to meet the foe with their rifles as they did most valiantly at Lexington of old; in the present war they can render their country no less patriotic and more effective service in the wheat field, the corn field and the cotton field with the plow, the cultivator and the reaper in repelling the threatened invasion of the land by famine, the gaunt, irresistible enemy that stalks beside war. Nor will they miss their reward, for prices are high and are bound to range higher for their products. Stern measures are to be invoked to prevent speculation in food stuff, and it is proposed to have the Federal government, if necessary, take over the products of the farms to protect the people from extortionate prices and ensure fair remuneration to the farmers.

Must Stop Food Waste or We Shall Suffer Want is Government's Warning

EVEN though our best efforts at production are aided by favorable growing weather the results are likely to be inadequate, and in case the season proves unfavorable the consequences will be disastrous unless we economize and conserve our present supply by cutting out all preventable waste. We are the most wasteful people in the world. Our waste has always amazed and shocked Europe whose economists have often told us that a European family could live well on the food that an average American family wastes. The necessity for reform is so pressing that our government, through its department of Agriculture, has launched a vigorous campaign to stop the waste of food in our homes—a needless, wicked waste estimated at seven hundred million dollars' worth a year.

The world's food supply is short and is bound to continue so for a year or more. Unless you wish to pay higher prices next fall and winter and suffer the pinch of hunger, too, stop wasting food. One difficulty in doing so is that waste has become so habitual with us that much of our wastefulness escapes our notice—is not recognized as such—and we do not know how to check it. Write to the Department of Agriculture, Office of Information, Washington, D. C., for its valuable and instructive free bulletins on economical use of foods and saving waste.

Watch for and Report Enemy Spies

OUR country is flooded with enemy spies intent on destroying lives and public and private property and instigating treason. They have done much damage. Hundreds of them are under arrest, but thousands are still at large—sneaking, treacherous, skulking, murderous foes more dangerous than open enemies. It is the duty of every loyal citizen to be on the watch for them and promptly inform the local authorities and the war Department, at Washington, of any persons whose conduct or talk is suspicious. Remember, they are not all Germans; they may be of any nationality—Some are native Americans.

Terms Used in Tatting

D. s. double stitch; p. picot; l. p. long picot; s. p. shorter than usual picot; ch. chain, a succession of double stitches made with two threads; pkt. picot and knot together. * indicates a repetition.

Attractive Tatting Designs

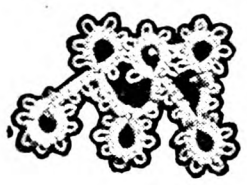
TATTING, which has in the past couple of years been steadily winning its way into popular favor as a trimming is supposed to have originated in China, though in the last centuries it has been more generally made in Ireland than elsewhere, the female population of entire villages being engaged in its manufacture.

Old photographs of Adelaide Niellson show her in a tatting-trimmed skirt, and for this tatting which was a flounce almost eighteen inches wide, the sweet voiced singer paid one-hundred dollars per yard.

Tatted Collar

For this collar first make a row of tatting as shown in No. 1, the length of the neck-band of the collar. Make rings of 7 p., chs. 2 p., join 2nd picots of rings.

No. 2, for next row is the same excepting lower edge of rings are not joined.



NO. 1.

These 2 rows should be joined as made by center picots, of rings.

Then the entire piece is edged with 7 p. rings and scallop. The scallop on the ends and bottom are of 5 ps. and along top 3 ps. Rings are joined together but simply to rings in last row.

Another border of 7 p. rings and 5 p. scallops is added to ends of collar. The rings joined only at 4th p. to center p. of scallop in last row.

NO. 2.

Beginning at corner, make ch. 3 p., 7 p. ring, ch., 7 p. ring join to scallop in last row, repeat around to opposite corner then finish end with rings and scallops.

No. 3. Medallion for corners and center of back. Begin with ring 6 p., surround with 6 rings of 10 p., with scallop between each of 7 p.

Place medallions as shown to fill front corners make scallop 5 p., 7 p. ring, scallop, ring scallop. To fill corners on the lower edge make scallop 5 p., 7 p. rings, then 3, 5 p. scallops, join to rings in last row.

On each side medallion in back fill in with five, 5 p. scallops and 5 rings 7 p. each.

NO. 4.

No. 4. Ring and point for edge. 7 p. ring, ch. 2 p., then with shuttle alone, 2 d. s., 1 p., 2 d. s., close, ch. 2 p, ring.

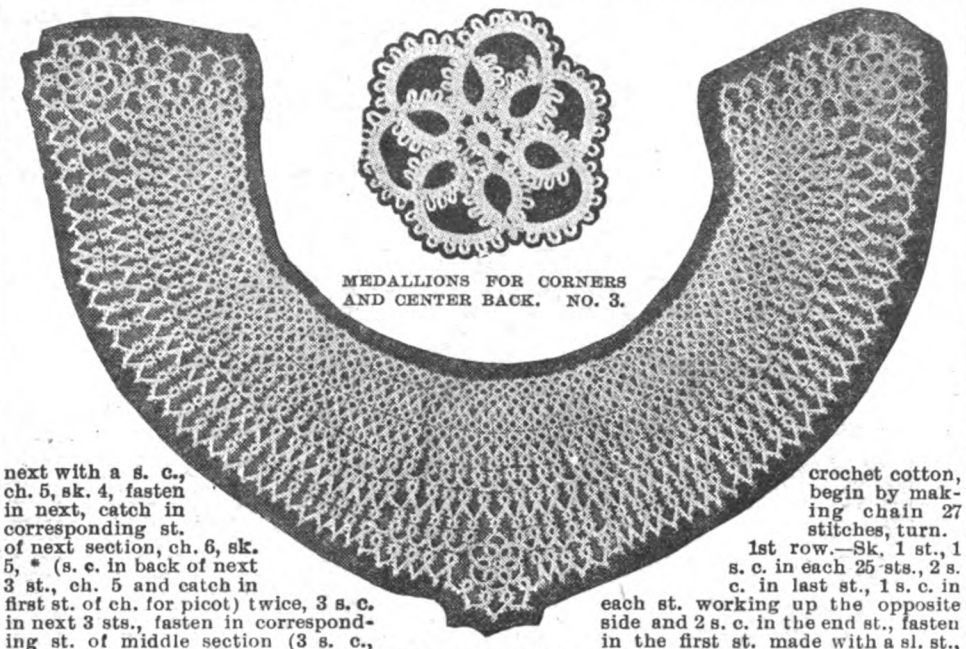
This is made in 2 rows. First one 7 p. ring, ch. 2 d. s., 1 p., 2 d. s., with spool thread small ring of 3 p., ch. of 1 p., ring 3 p., ch. 1 p., ring 7 p., join to first ring at 2nd p. of each. Repeat.

Ivy Leaf Lace

A medium fine cotton was used for this sample. The leaves are made first as follows ch. 8, join; ch. 12, turn, 1 d. c. in 4th st., ch. 1, sk. 1, tr. c. in next ch. 1, sk. 1, d. c. in next ch. 1, sk. 1, s. c. in next, ch. 2, 2 d. c. in ring. This completes the foundation for the first section of leaf.

2nd section.—Ch. 17, d. c. in 5th st., (ch. 1, sk. 1, tr. c. in next) twice, ch. 1, sk. 1, d. c. in next ch. 1, sk. 1, d. tr. c. in next, ch. 1, sk. 1, d. c. in next ch. 2, 2 s. c. in ring.

3rd section.—Ch. 23, d. c. in 5th st., (ch. 1, sk. 1, tr. c. in next) three times (ch. 1, sk. 1, d. c. in next) twice ch. 1, sk. 1, d. tr. c. in next (ch. 1, sk. 1 d. c. in next) twice ch. 2, 2 s. c. in ring.



The fourth section is like the second.

Fifth section is like first with four doubles after it instead of two.

2nd row.—2 s. c. in first 2 st. of first section d. c. in next st. and 1 tr. c. in each st. around the section working in back loop and widening in middle of section by putting three tr. c. in same st. so the edge will lie flat. Finish section as began with d. c. and 2 s. c. Work 2, sl. sts. in 2 s. c. in ring and continue around each section in same way. After fifth section make 2 sl. st. in 2 d. c. of ring, ch. 15 for stem, turn, sk. 1, s. c. in each of nine st., ch. 6, sk. 1, s. c. in each of five st. then s. c. in each of 5 st. remaining of original ch. Fasten in st. next to first section and break thread.

Make as many leaves as required and join with a picot edge thus:

Fasten thread in end of short arm of stem and catch in upper side of first section where it will lie flat, ch. 6, sk. 4 d. c. and fasten in next with a s. c., ch. 5, sk. 4, fasten in next, catch in corresponding st. of next section, ch. 6, sk. 5, * (s. c. in back of next 3 st., ch. 5 and catch in first st. of ch. for picot) twice, 3 s. c. in next 3 sts., fasten in corresponding st. of middle section (3 s. c., picot) 7 times, 3 s. c., catch in next section (3 d. c., picot) 3 times, 3 s. c., fasten in last section, s. c. in each st. to top of section and fasten in middle st. of second section of next leaf. Repeat from *.

Table Mats

This unusually effective pattern for crocheted mats is a particularly good design for hot dishes, as the center is very close and solid.

When making a set of mats the number may vary but for a small family seven makes a very good set; two large round ones, one large oval one, two medium-sized ovals, and two small round or oval ones as preferred.

The only difference in making these round and oval mats is that the oval ones begin with a chain in the center, longer or shorter according to the size of the mat desired, while the round ones are begun in the center by joining a chain in small ring.

For an oval mat of medium size, using coarse crochet cotton, begin by making chain 27 stitches, turn.

1st row.—Sk. 1 st., 1 s. c. in each 25 sts., 2 s. c. in last st., 1 s. c. in each st. working up the opposite side and 2 s. c. in the end st., fasten in the first st. made with a sl. st., turn.

2nd row.—Ch. 1, then working down the side just finished and taking up only the half of the st. farthest from you, make 1 s. c. in the first st., 2 s. c. in the next, then 1 s. c. in each of the next 23 sts., 2 s. c. in next, 1 in next st., 2 s. c. in end st., 1 s. c. in next st., then 2 s. c. 1 s. c. in next 23 sts., 2 s. c. in next st., sl. st. to first st. in this row, turn and work back over the side just finished as follows.

4th row.—Ch. 1, 1 s. c. in each of 3 sts., 2 s. c. in next, 1 s. c. in 24 sts., 2 s. c. in next 1 s. c. in 3 sts., 2 s. c. in next, 1 s. c. in each next 3 sts., 2 s. c. in next, 1 s. c. in 24 sts. 2 s. c. in next, 1 s. c. in each next 3 sts. and join and turn.

Continue working in this way until there are 6 ribs on each side of the foundation chain. Be careful always to widen by working 2 s. c. in one of the 2 widening singles of the previous row, and always take up only the back loop of each st. in each round.

Border of Mats

Begin the first row with a ch. 4 and continue to work in the same direction instead of turning as before; Skip over 2 sts., 1 s. c. in each of the next 4 sts., ch. 4, sk. 2, 4 s. c. Work once around in this way finishing with 4 s. c. on last 4 sts., 11 groups 4 s. c. in all.

2nd row.—Ch. 3, 4 d. c. under ch. 4, ch. 3, 2 s. c. on 4 s. c. in last row. Work once around in this way, finishing with 2 s. c. on 4 s. c.

3rd row.—Ch. 4, 4 s. c. on 4 d. c., ch. 4, 4 s. c. on next 4 d. c., repeat all around. In working this row if one crochets loosely chains of 3 may prove long enough, but the work should neither draw nor be full, so chains should be made just long enough so the work will lie flat. End this row with a ch. and then 1 s. c. under first ch. 4.

6th row.—Ch. 3, 1 d. c. in each st., ending with a d. c. on the first d. c. made in this row.

7th row.—Ch. 3, sk. 1 d. c., 9 s. c. in next 9 d. c., ch. 3, sk. 2 d. c., 9 d. c. on next 9 d. c. Repeat from the beginning of this row all around.

8th row.—Ch. 3, 8 s. c. on 9 s. c., ch. 3, 1 d. c. in first d. c., ch. 1, 1 d. c. in 2 d. c., ch. 1, 1 d. c., ch. 1, 1 d. c., ch. 1, 1 d. c. Repeat, making 9 d. c. in all, then repeat from the beginning of this row, all around.

9th row.—Same as last with exception of making chains 2 between each of the 9 d. c., and working only 7 s. c. on the 8 s. c.

10th row.—Same as 9th with exception of making chains 3 between d. c. and working only 5 s. c. on 7 s. c.

11th row.—The same as last except that only 3 s. c. are worked on the 5 s. c. Finish with sl. st., under ch., then ch. 4, 1 sl. st. under ch. other side of 3 s. c.

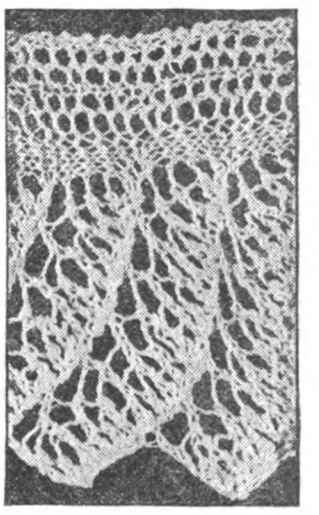
12th row.—Ch. 3, 1 s. c. between 1st and 2nd d. c., ch. 3, 1 s. c. under same ch. This forms picot. Ch. 3, 1 p. between next 2 doubles. Finish the edge by working all around in this way.

Round Mats

Begin these with ch. 5, join in ring, fill with singles and reverse each row in center to form ribs as in oblong mats.

In 4th round work 2 s. c. in the first st. and at five other points, thus dividing the round into 6 equal parts.

Work 7 or more ribs in this way according to the size of the mat then finish with border.



Knitted Point Lace

Cast on 23 stitches.

1st row.—K. 2, o, twice, purl 2 tog., thread back, k. 1, o. twice, purl 2 tog., k. 4, o. twice, k. 2, together 6 times.

2nd row.—K. 2, p. 1, this is knit first of loop and purl last half, 6 times, k. 4, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 1, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 2.

3rd row.—K. 2, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 1, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 4, o. twice, k. 2 in 1, 9 times.

POINT LACE. (KNITTED.)

4th row.—P. 1, 9 times, k. 4, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 1, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 2.

5th row.—K. 2, p. 2 tog., k. 1, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 4, o. twice, k. 2, tog., 13 times, k. 1.

6th row.—K. 3, p. 2, k. 2, p. 1, 12 times, k. 4, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 1, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 2.

7th row.—K. 2, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 1, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 4, o. twice, k. 2 in 1, 20 times.

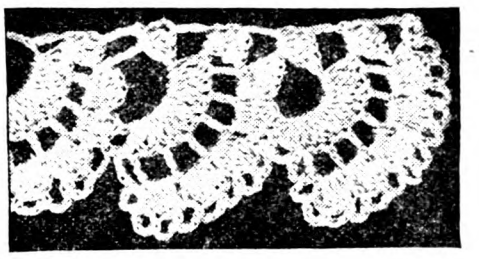
8th row.—K. 2, p. 1, 20 times, k. 4, o. twice p. 2 tog., k. 1, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 2.

9th row.—K. 2, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 1, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 4, k. 2 in 1 to end of the row.

10th row.—Cast off 7, k. 2 in 1, 11 times o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 1, o. twice, p. 2 tog., k. 2.

Repeat from 1st row.

M. M. HAWLEY.



Shell Edging

Ch. 12, join in ring, ch. 3, turn.

1st row.—Into ring work 15 tr. c., ch. 3, turn.

2nd row.—3 d. c. in first st., ch. 2, sk. 2, 1 d. c., * ch. 2, sk. 2, 1 d. c., repeat from * making 6 spaces in all, ch. 2, turn.

2rd row.—3 d. c., 1 s. c. in first sp., 1 s. c., 3 d. c., 1 s. c. in each of the next 4 spaces, ch. 5, 1 d. c. in last st. of last row, ch. 3, turn.

SHELL EDGING

4th row.—Shell 3 d. c. under ch. 5, ch. 8, sl. st. to center second shell, ch. 3, turn.

5th row.—12 tr. c. under ch. 8, ch. 3, 1 tr. c. in last st. of last row.

Tatting Book Notice

In response to the demand and for the benefit of our readers who are interested in tatting, we have issued a 16-page booklet of special designs by COMFORT workers.

This Tatting Book illustrates very plainly just how the work is to be done, by showing the various position of the worker's hands, which are accompanied by explicit directions for the different movements used in making the stitch.

It also contains a complete range of patterns from the simplest edgings and insertions to handsome designs worked with one and two threrds, including patterns for doilies, centerpieces, scarfs, lingerie, waists, yokes, collars, infants' and boudoir caps, bags, etc.

We will send a copy of this book free for one new yearly subscription (not your own) at 25c., or for your own subscription or renewal and ten cents extra 35c in all. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

The Masked Bridal

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Edith Allandale, the only support of an invalid mother pawns a valuable watch. To redeem it she offers a five-dollar gold piece, paid to her by Royal Bryant, to the broker, who, dropping it into the drawer declares it a counterfeit and returns it. Going home her mother suggests it may be genuine and again Edith goes out to buy food and coal. While eating supper an officer enters, followed by the grocer who insists upon Edith's arrest for passing counterfeit money. She is hurried to the station house, leaving her mother in the care of Kate O'Brien. Edith writes to Royal Bryant explaining the situation. He redeems the watch, secures Edith's release and sends her home, where she finds her mother dying. After her death in reading letters, Edith learns she is an adopted daughter, the child of a dear friend, who believes she is legally a wife, until the father of her child admits his perfidy and deserts her. Edith writes Mr. Bryant, giving no address and goes to Boston, securing a position as companion with Mrs. Gerald Goddard. Edith discovers there is a skeleton in the family, when Mrs. Goddard accuses her of attempting to steal her husband's affections. Emil Correlli, Mrs. Goddard's brother is persistent in his attentions to Edith; she tries to avoid him and decides to leave. Mrs. Goddard begs her to stay. Edith, going to walk renders assistance to Mrs. Stewart, who is attracted to her and shows agitation when she learns she is a companion to Mrs. Goddard, and if she needs a friend to come to her. Edith is overtaken by Emil Correlli. Nearing Mrs. Goddard's house, a woman, unknown to Edith addresses Emil in a foreign tongue. Realizing that Edith thinks there is something mysterious in his relation to this woman he endeavors to set it right, renews his protestations of love, offers marriage and is staggered by her refusal. Mrs. Goddard unfolds a scheme which cannot fail to make Edith Allen his wife, but Emil must go away. Mrs. Goddard plans with Edith for a "mid-winter frolic," at their country home. The housekeeper, Mrs. Weld, overhears Mr. Goddard entreating his wife for a certain document. Mrs. Goddard proposes a theatrical performance entitled "The Masked Bridal." The guests arrive. Mrs. Weld takes a folded paper from Mrs. Goddard's jewel case; it vindicates her. Mrs. Goddard, having sent for Edith and seeing Mrs. Weld in an adjoining room devises a scheme to get her from meeting Edith to whom she explains that Miss Kerby and brother who have the leading parts, have been summoned home and requests Edith to supply Miss Kerby's place. Edith objects to what appears sacrilege. Over persuaded she consents and veiled and masked the ceremony is performed. When she hears Mrs. Goddard congratulate Emil she grasps the duplicity and nearly falls senseless. Mrs. Goddard, returning to the ballroom asks Emil to introduce his friend, Mrs. Stewart. Meeting her, Mrs. Goddard calls her husband, who recognizes in Mrs. Stewart his former wife. Recovering from the shock Edith talks with Mrs. Goddard, who implores her to see Emil and forgive his deception. She listens to his entreaties and later his commands and utterly refuses to ever break bread at his table.

CHAPTER XX.

EDITH RESOLVES TO MEET HER ENEMIES WITH THEIR OWN WEAPONS.

THE morning following her interview with Emil Correlli, when Edith attempted to leave her room to go down to breakfast, she found to her dismay, that her door had been fastened on the outside.

An angry flush leaped to her brow.

"So they imagine they can make me bend to their will by making a prisoner of me, do they?" she exclaimed, with flashing eyes and scornful lips. "We shall see!"

But she was powerless just then to help herself, and so was obliged to make the best of her situation for the present.

Presently some one knocked upon her door, and she heard a bolt moved—it having been placed there during the night. Then Mrs. Goddard appeared before her, smiling a gracious good morning, and bearing a tray, upon which there was a daintily arranged breakfast.

"We thought it best for you to eat here, since you do not feel like coming down to the dining-room," she kindly remarked, as she set the tray upon the table.

Edith opened her lips to make some scathing retort; but, a bright thought suddenly flashing through her mind, she checked herself, and replied, appreciatively:

"Thank you, Mrs. Goddard."

"Ah! she is beginning to come around," thought the wily woman.

But, concealing her secret pleasure at this change in her victim, she remarked, in her ordinary tone:

"We shall leave for the city very soon after breakfast, so please have everything ready so as not to keep the horses standing in the cold."

"Everything is ready now," said Edith, glancing at her trunk, which she had locked just before trying the door.

"That is well, and I will send for you when the carriage comes around."

Edith simply bowed to show that she heard, and then her companion retired, locking the door after her, but marveling at the girl's apparent submission.

"There is no way to outwit rogues except with their own weapons—cunning and deceit," murmured the fair prisoner, bitterly, as she began to eat her breakfast. "I will be very wary and apparently submissive until I have matured my plans, and then they may chew their cud of defeat as long as it pleases them to do so."

After finishing her meal she dressed herself for the coming drive, but wondered why Mrs. Weld had not been up to see her, for, of course, she must know that something unusual had happened, or that she was ill again, since she had not joined her at breakfast.

A little later she heard a stealthy step outside her door and the next moment an envelope was slipped beneath it into her room; then the steps retreated, and all was still again.

Rising, Edith picked up the missive and opened it, when another sealed envelope, addressed to her, in a beautiful, lady-like hand, and postmarked Boston, was revealed, together with a brief note hastily written with a pencil.

This latter proved to be from Mrs. Weld.

"Dear Child," it ran, "I have been requested not to go to you this morning, as you are particularly engaged, which, of course, I understand as a command to keep out of the way. But I want you to know that I mean to stand by you, and shall do all in my power to help you. I shall manage to see or write to you again in a day or two. Meantime, don't lose heart.

"Affectionately yours,

"GERTRUDE WELD.

"P. S.—The inclosed letter came for you in last night's mail. I captured it for you."

With an eager light in her eyes, Edith opened it and read:

"Boston, Feb. —, 18—.

"MY DEAR MISS ALLEN:—I have learned of the wretched deception that has been practised upon you, and hasten to write this to assure you that my previous offer of friendship—when we met at the time of the accident to my coachman—was not a mere matter of form. Again I say, if you need a friend, come to me, and I will do my utmost to shield you from those who have shown themselves your worst enemies, and whom I know to be unworthy of the position which they occupy in the social world. Come to me when you will, and I promise to protect you from them. I cannot say more upon paper.

"Sincerely yours, ISABEL STEWART."

"How very kind and yet how very strange!" murmured Edith, as she refolded the letter. "I wonder who could have told her about that wretched affair of Tuesday evening. I wonder, too, what she knows about the Goddards, and if I had better accept her friendly offer."

She reflected upon the matter for a few minutes, and then continued:

"I think I will go to New York first, as I had planned, see what Mr. Bryant can do for me, and ascertain the meaning of that strange personal; then I think I will come back and ask her to take me as a companion—for I do not believe that what I shall learn to my financial advantage will amount to enough to preclude the necessity of my doing something for my support. I suppose I ought to answer this letter, though," she added, meditatively; "but I believe I shall not dare to until I am safely away from Boston, for if my reply should fall into the hands of any member of this family, my plans might be frustrated."

She carefully concealed both notes about her person, and then sat down to await orders to go below.

A little later Mrs. Goddard came to her and said they were about ready to leave for the city, and requested her to go down into the hall.

Edith arose with apparent alacrity, and madam noticed with an expression of satisfaction that her bearing was less aggressive than when they had last met.

She followed Mrs. Goddard down-stairs and seated herself in the hall to await the signal for departure.

Presently Mr. Goddard came in from outdoors. He started slightly upon seeing Edith, then paused and inquired kindly if she was feeling quite well again.

Edith thanked him, and briefly remarked that she was, when he startled her by stooping suddenly and whispering in her ear:

"Count upon me as your friend, my child; I promise you that I will do all in my power to help you thwart your enemies."

He waited for no answer, but passed quickly on and entered the library.

Edith was astonished, and while, for the moment, she was touched by his unexpected offer of assistance, she at the same time distrusted him.

A few minutes later the carriage was driven to the door—the snow having become so soft they were obliged to return to the city on wheels—when Mrs. Goddard came hurrying from the dining-room where she had been giving some last orders to the servants, and bidding Edith follow her, passed out of the house and entered the carriage.

Edith was scarcely seated beside her when Emil Correlli made his appearance and settled himself opposite her.

The young girl flushed, but, schooling herself to carry out the part which she had determined to assume for the present, made no other sign to betray how distasteful his presence was to her.

Upon their arrival in town, Mrs. Goddard remarked to Edith:

"I have been obliged to take, for a servant, the room you used to occupy, dear; consequently, you will have to go into the south chamber for the present. Thomas," turning to a man and pointing to Edith's trunk, "take this trunk directly up to the south chamber."

Edith's heart gave a startled bound at this unexpected change.

The "south chamber" was the handsomest sleeping apartment in the house—the guest chamber, in fact—and she understood at once why it had thus been assigned to her.

It was intended that she should pose and be treated in every respect as became the wife of madam's brother, and thus the best room in the house had been set apart for her use.

She knew that it would be both useless and unwise to make any objections; the change had been determined upon, and doubtless her old room was already occupied by a servant, to prevent the possibility of her returning to it.

Thus, after the first glance of surprise at madam, she turned and quietly followed the man who was taking up her trunk.

"But, on entering the "south chamber," another surprise awaited her, for the apartment had been fitted up with even greater luxury than previous to their leaving for the country.

Upon the bed there lay an elegant seal-skin garment, which, at a glance, Edith knew must have been cut to fit her figure, and beside it there was a pretty muff and a Parisian hat, while over the footboard there hung three or four beautiful dresses.

"Do they suppose that they could buy me over—tempt me to sell myself for this gorgeous finery?" the indignant girl exclaimed. "They must think me very weak-minded and variable if they did."

But her curiosity was excited to see how far they had carried their extravagant bribery; and, going back to the dressing-case she drew out the upper drawer.

Notwithstanding her indignation and scorn, she could not suppress a cry of mingled astonishment and admiration at what she saw there, for the receptacle contained the daintiest lingerie imaginable.

There were beautiful laces, handkerchiefs, and gloves, suitable for every occasion; three or four fans of costly material and exquisite workmanship; a pair of pearl-and-gold opera glasses.

More than this, and arranged so as to cunningly tempt the eye, there were several cases of jewels—comprising pearls, diamonds, emeralds and rubies.

It was an array to tempt the most obdurate heart and fancy and Edith stood gazing upon the lovely things with admiring eyes while, after a moment, a little sigh of regret accompanied her resolute act of shutting the drawer and turning the key in its lock.

"What a pity to spend so much money for nothing," Edith murmured regretfully, when she had concluded her inspection. "It is very evident that they look upon me as a silly, vacillating girl, who can be easily managed and won over by pretty clothes and glittering baubles. I suppose there are girls whose highest ambition in life is to possess such things, and to lead an existence of luxury and pleasure—who would doubtless sell themselves for them; but I should hate and scorn myself for accepting anything of the kind from a man whom I could neither respect nor love."

She gave utterance to a heavy sigh as she closed the drawer and turned away from the dressing-case; not, however, because she longed to possess the beautiful things she had seen, but in view of the difficulties which might lie before her to hamper her movements in the effort to escape from her enemies.

"I suppose I must remain here for a few hours at least," she continued, an expression of anxiety flitting over her face, "and if I expect to carry out my plans successfully I must begin by assuming a submissive role."

She removed her hat and wraps, hanging them in a closet; then, going to her trunk, she selected what few articles she would absolutely need on her journey to New York, and some important papers—among them the letters which her own mother had written—and after hastily making them up into a neat package, returned them again to the trunk for concealment, until she should be ready to leave the house.

This done, she sat down by a window to await and meet, with what fortitude she could command the next act in the drama of her life.

Not long after she heard a step in the hall, then there came a knock on her door, and madam's voice called out:

"It is only I, Edith; may I come in?"

"Yes, come," unhesitatingly responded the girl, and Mrs. Goddard entered the room.

"How do you like your new quarters, dear?" she inquired, searching Edith's fair face with eager eyes.

"Of course, everything is very beautiful."

"And are you pleased with the additions to the furnishings?—the chair, the work-table, and writing-desk?"

"I have never seen anything more lovely."

"I knew you would like them," said madam, "they are exquisite, and Emil is going to have them carefully packed, and take them along for you to use wherever you stop in your travels. And the cloak and dresses—aren't they perfectly elegant? The jewels, too, and other things in the dressing case; have you seen them?"

"Yes, I have seen them all; but—but I am very sorry that so much money should have been spent for me."

"Oh, the money is of no account, if you are only happy," Mrs. Goddard lightly remarked. "And now," she went on eagerly, "I want you to dress yourself just as nicely as you can, and be ready, when the bell rings, to come down to lunch, as it becomes—my sister. Will you, dear?" she concluded, coaxingly. "Do, Edith, be reasonable; let us bury the hatchet, and all be on good terms."

"I—I do not think I can quite make up my mind to go down to lunch," Edith faltered, with averted face.

Madam frowned; she had begun to think her victory was won, and the disappointment nettled her. But she controlled herself and remarked pleasantly:

"Well, then, I will send up your lunch, if you will promise to come down and dine with us, will you?"

Edith hesitated a moment; then, drawing a long breath, she remarked, as if with bashful hesitancy:

"I think, perhaps—I will go down later—by and by."

"Now you are beginning to be sensible, dear," said madm, flashing a covert look of exultation at her, "and Emil will be so happy. Put on this silver-gray silk—it is so lovely, trimmed with white lace—and the pearls; you will be charming in the costume. I am sorry I have to go directly after lunch," she continued, regretfully, "but I have a call to make, and shall not be back for a couple of hours; but Emil will be here; so if you can find it in your heart to be a little kind to him, just put on the gray silk—or anything else you may prefer—and go down to him. May I tell him that you will?"

"I will not promise—at least until after you return."

Madam could have laughed in triumph, for she believed the victory was hers.

"Well, perhaps you would feel a trifle shy about it," she said, good naturedly, "it would be pleasanter and easier for you, no doubt, if I were here, so I will come for you when I get back. Good by till then."

And with a satisfied little nod and smile, madam left her and went down-stairs to tell her brother that his munificence had won the day and he would have no further trouble with a fractious bride.

CHAPTER XXI.

A MYSTERIOUS STRANGER PAYS EDITH AN UNEXPECTED VISIT.

Edith listened until she heard madam descend the stairs, when she sprang to her feet in a fever of excitement.

"Oh, how I hate myself for practising even that much of deceit!" she bitterly exclaimed; "to allow her to think for a moment that I have been won over by those baubles. Although I told her no lie, I do intend to go down by and by if I can see an opportunity to get out of the house. But I did so long to stand boldly up and repudiate her proposals and all these costly bribes. Dress myself in those things!" she continued, with a scornful glance toward the bed; "make myself look 'pretty and nice,' with the price of my self-respect, and then go down to flaunt before the man who has grossly insulted me by assuming that he could bribe me to submission! I would rather be clothed in rags—the very sight of these things makes me sick at heart."

She turned resolutely from them, and, drawing the stiffest and hardest chair in the room to a window, sat down with her back to the allurements around her and gazed out upon the street.

She remained there until her lunch was sent up, when she ate enough to barely satisfy her hunger, after which she went back to her post to watch for the departure of Mrs. Goddard.

The house stood upon a corner, and thus faced upon two streets—the avenue in front, and at the side a cross-street that led through to Beacon street. Thus, Edith's room being upon the front of the mansion, she had a wide outlook in two directions.

Not long after stationing herself at the window, she saw Mrs. Goddard go out, and then she began to wonder how she could manage to make her escape before her return.

She knew that she was only a prisoner in the house in spite of the fact that her door was not locked; that Emil Correlli had been left below simply to act as her keeper; and, should she make the slightest attempt to escape, he would immediately intercept her.

She could not get out of the house except by the front way, and to do this she would have to pass down a long flight of stairs and by two or three rooms, in any one of which Emil Correlli might be on the watch in anticipation of this very proceeding.

There was a back stairway; but as this led directly up from the area hall, the door at the bottom was always carefully kept locked—the

The COMFORT Sisters' Corner

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

NO lengthy discourse of mine on Mothers and Mothers' Day could express so much as the following article, "Kissing Mother," written by Eli Perkins, which I hope will be read by our girls and boys and applied every day in their home life.—Ed.

"Kissing Mother"

A father, talking to his careless daughter, said:

"I want to speak to you of your mother. It may be that you have noticed a careworn look upon her face lately. Of course, it has not been brought there by any act of yours, still it is your duty to chase it away. I want you to get up tomorrow morning and get breakfast; and when your mother comes, and begins to express her surprise, go right up to her and kiss her on the mouth. You can't imagine how it will brighten her dear face.

"Besides, you owe her a kiss or two. Away back, when you were a little girl, she kissed you when no one else was tempted by your fever-tainted breath and swollen face. You were not as attractive then as you are now. And through those years of childish sunshine and shadows, she was always ready to cure, by the magic of a mother's kiss, the little, dirty, chubby hands whenever they were injured in those first skirmishes with the rough old world.

"And then the midnight kiss with which she routed so many bad dreams, as she leaned above your restless pillow, have all been on interest these long, long years.

"Of course, she is not so pretty and kissable as you are; but if you had done your share of work during the last ten years, the contrast would not be so marked.

"Her face has more wrinkles than yours, and yet, if you were sick, that face would appear far more beautiful than an angel's as it hovered over you, watching every opportunity to minister to your comfort, and every one of those wrinkles would seem to be bright wavelets of sunshine chasing each other over the dear face.

"She will leave you one of these days. These burdens, if not lifted from her shoulders, will break her down. Those rough, hard hands that have done so many necessary things for you will be crossed upon her lifeless breast.

"Those neglected lips, that gave you your first baby kiss, will be forever closed, and those sad, tired eyes will have opened in eternity, and then you will appreciate your mother; but it will be too late."

MONTANA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Here comes a very puzzled woman to your department, asking your help, though I hardly know how to express my wants.

I live in the average small town; that is, we have our few rich people, a few very poor ones, but the majority are in comfortable circumstances, though all are working people. General conditions are no worse than in a great many small towns and country places but it seems to me they could be improved. Our schools are as good as the average and I think that the parents could take a greater interest in their children and their health than they do. I don't mean by this that they are uncared for or neglected to any material extent and many of my neighbors would be shocked if they even knew my thoughts about them. Isn't there some way for me to awaken them to a sense of their responsibilities without making myself conspicuous or arousing their enmity? At the same time I'm admitting my own ignorance of a great many things and I want more than all else to give my children (I have three) the best possible care.

I know this is a lot to ask of you and the sisters, but it means so much to me—and the children of our community. Dissatisfied.

Dissatisfied. You couldn't have chosen a better nom de plume. Just think what a commonplace, unprogressive world this would be if everyone were satisfied with things as they are and content to drift on as they had for years with no thought of bettering themselves and conditions. Why don't you get some of the most prominent townspeople interested in a Baby-week Campaign? The U. S. Dept. of Labor, Children's Bureau, has gotten out a very interesting booklet on this which they send on application. In the meantime I'll give you brief extracts that may be of help to you.—Ed.

Baby Week Campaign

Some communities celebrated the whole week; in others baby week lasted one day or three or five days. The seven-day programs usually ran about as follows: Flag Day, Baby Sunday, school day, fathers' day, outing day, visiting day, and birth-registration day. Baby Sabbath was also celebrated in many cities.

This general program was varied in some towns by a tag day; one featured a rural mothers' day, one a merchants' baby booster day, one a recognition day (when business houses put out flags and everyone interested was asked to wear a flower), and one had a baby button day. In North Dakota the general plan was to call flag day advertising day, and concentrate that day on letting everybody know what was coming. The program of a middle western city was: Baby Sunday, daddy's day, mother's day, the baby's day, home day, welfare day, parade day.

Expenses varied all the way from about four thousand dollars spent by one middle western city to thirty-five cents spent by a Southern village, and nothing at all spent for a baby week which had an enthusiastic constituency from both city and country.

Flag day was usually the first day of the celebration. The object of flag day was to see that every house where a baby lived put out a flag and kept it flying throughout the week. One Missouri town, on the other hand, asked the parents to wear flags instead of flying them from the windows. The flags adopted by the different towns varied widely, though many towns did not design a special flag for the occasion but used small American flags.

Baby Sunday was generally observed by an announcement of baby week and its purposes from the pulpits of various religious bodies. In some cases sermons on baby welfare were preached. Physicians were invited to occupy pulpits on Sunday evening in several communities.

Fathers' Day. In manufacturing towns fathers' day was celebrated by holding shop meetings with good speakers to address fathers on the whole question of what the community owes to its babies, with special reference to local conditions, good and bad. Several towns were successful in getting physicians to address fathers' meetings on the social evil and its effect on children.

The outing day proved popular in towns which celebrated later in the year than March. The usual plan was for the committee to collect all the automobiles it could borrow and fill them with mothers and babies. One city made a combination of outing and visiting day; parties of mothers and babies were taken in automobiles to visit baby camps maintained in one of the suburbs.

Parades, sometimes combined with visits to infant-welfare stations, were reported from several cities. Boy Scouts and members of Little Mothers' Leagues, trained nurses and others who were helping in the celebration were among those who marched in parades. Banners and labels voicing local needs were used effectively.

Here is a newspaper report of a successful parade held in Louisiana:

Babies to right of us,
Babies to left of us,
Babies in front of us,
Babies enough to dazzle us,
God bless 'em,
So say we, all of us.

Baby-Welfare Exhibits

The many exhibits held during baby week in 1916 had one or both of the following aims: They showed the need of infant-welfare work in a particular community, or they gave mothers information regarding the proper care of babies and children.

An exhibit on the dairy inspection system was prepared by a city chemist in Texas. He showed the visitors clean and also dirty milk under the miscroscope. The exhibit in a Pennsylvania city included material about pure food, with a special demonstration by girls from the domestic-science classes of the public schools. At the same exhibit boys of the manual training classes made and demonstrated small models of a dirty dairy, a clean dairy and a playground.

The exhibits on the care of the baby frequently included demonstrations. At one Rhode Island exhibit a woman showed how patterns for baby clothes should be laid on the material to cut to the best advantage. The proper way of bathing and dressing a baby was frequently shown. Some communities added to the interest of this demonstration by having a live baby for a subject instead of an India rubber one.

One Kansas town had an exhibit in fashioning layettes—old-fashioned ones, with very long dresses and elaborate embroidery, and inexpensive modern ones.

Aside from material of an educational nature, the baby weeks of 1916 produced a little litera-

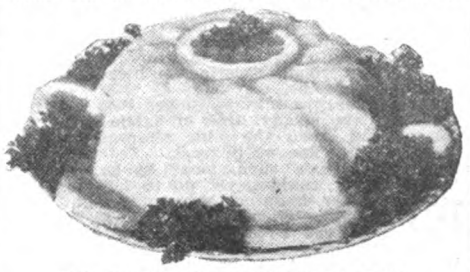
Comfort Sisters' Recipes

Bill-of-Fare Making With Cheese as the Central Food

SINCE meat has so generally been the chief protein food of a meal, and the kind selected usually has determined the choice of vegetables and condiments, it is not strange that very many housekeepers should be inexperienced and consequently unskillful in planning meals in which cheese is substituted for meat when for any reason they may desire to make such a change. In seeking skill they might take a suggestion from the experiments to which reference has been made, and also from a case investigated and reported by the Office of Experiment Stations, of a man who lived for months upon a diet of bread, fruit and cheese, and who remained in good health and active, and did not weary of the monotony of the diet.

The first two articles of the diet mentioned, namely, the bread and the cheese, could have been taken in such amounts as to constitute what is usually considered a balanced ration, i, e., in such amounts as to supply the right quantity of muscle-forming foods in comparison with the energy value. The bread and cheese taken with the fruit, however, make a ration which is well balanced not only in the older and more widely accepted sense, but also in the more modern sense that it makes an attractive and palatable combination of foods, as well as a balanced ration, and thus favors digestion. The watery and refreshing fruits or succulent vegetables with their large supply of cellulose are a pleasant contrast to the concentrated and fatty cheese.



Housekeepers would probably find that if in planning menus of which a cheese dish is the chief feature they were to take pains to supply also crisp, watery vegetables, water cress, celery, lettuce served with a dressing or with salt alone, or simple fruit salads, and would give preference to refreshing fruits, either fresh or cooked, rather than to what are known as heavy desserts, they would in general be more successful in pleasing those who are served.

There is another point also to be considered in combining cheese with other foods. Whether it is raw or cooked it is likely to be somewhat soft, and so seems to call for the harder kinds of bread—crusty rolls or biscuit, zweiback, toast, pulled bread, rye bread, the harder brown breads, or crackers, and some of the numerous crisp ready-to-eat cereal breakfast foods. Brittle cookies, too, seem more suitable than rich, soft cakes or puddings for the dessert in such meals.

DELICIOUS CHICKEN.—Cook chicken till nearly done, in salted water, cut into small pieces and place in a baking dish. Soak two slices of stale bread in cold water, add a little flour, and mustard, sage, pepper and cinnamon to taste; mix, make into balls and place around the chicken; add the water in which the chicken was cooked and place in oven for half an hour. ANNIE LEWIS, Ager, Cal.

FISH SOUFFLE WITH HOLLANDAISE SAUCE.—Use leftovers for this very appetizing dish. One cup of cold boiled fish mixed with one cup of fine white bread crumbs and one half cup of rich milk or cream. Mix together, add pepper and salt to taste, two teaspoons of lemon juice, and the well-beaten yolks of two eggs. Mix again and add the egg whites beaten stiff. Pour into a buttered baking dish, and bake in a moderate oven about thirty minutes. Turn over on a hot dish and surround with sauce. Garnish with parsley and lemon slices.

SAUCE.—Place sauce pan at first where the stove is just warm. Put in quarter of a cup of butter, one saltspoon of salt, pinch of pepper, dash of cayenne, one quarter of a cup of cold water, and the yolks of two eggs. Beat together with a spoon, increasing the heat all the time, and when hot (not boiling) place in larger pan of hot water, stirring constantly until it thickens. Add one tablespoon of lemon juice and serve immediately.

SALMON LOAF.—Add to one can of salmon, two eggs, well beaten, one tablespoon melted butter, seven soda crackers, ground fine, juice of one lemon, and salt to taste. Bake in loaf and serve with mayonnaise.
MISS ESTELLA FRAVER, Hammondsport, N. Y.

HOME-MADE COTTAGE CHEESE SALAD.—Very carefully dish sour milk into a cheese cloth bag which is made of two thicknesses. Hang in sun until all the whey has drained through. Season with salt and a little butter or cream. To one cup of cheese, add one third cup of finely broken walnut or pecan meats. Form into balls, sprinkle with a dash of red pepper and chill. Arrange on lettuce leaves prepared with French dressing.

COCOANUT DROPS.—One pound of grated cocoanut, one half pound powdered sugar and whites of six eggs, beaten to a stiff froth. Mix well and drop into buttered tins and bake. Add any desired flavoring.
MRS. MINNIE BLACKBURN, Friendship, Tenn.

NOODLES.—To one egg, beaten lightly, add salt to taste, then sufficient flour to roll as thin as paper. Roll as for a jelly roll. Cut in thin slices, shake out and flour, add to your soup and let simmer fifteen minutes. If you wish to use noodles as a vegetable, double the quantity, say use two eggs.

RYE BREAD. (Requested.)—One sifter or five and three quarters cups white flour, two sifters of rye flour, six cups warm water, two yeast cakes, dissolved in some of the water, one half cup melted lard, two tablespoons salt, four tablespoons sugar and one half teaspoon soda. Mix all together at night. Knead down in the morning. When light, divide into four loaves and let rise again in the pans.
MRS. J. B. SILLIMAN, Patchague, N. Y.

PIEPLANT BUTTER.—One gallon of cut up pie plant, one pound of seedless raisins six oranges, cut fine, and two pounds of granulated sugar. Put the fruit in a preserving kettle and when boiling well add the sugar and stir frequently until it is almost smooth. This will make two and one half quarts of butter and when tightly sealed will keep indefinitely. It is of fine flavor and being mildly laxative is health giving. IVY J. NEFF, Burrows, Ind.

HAM AND EGGS ON TOAST.—Trim slices of bread into rounds, toast and sprinkle with ground ham. For each slice of toast beat the white of one egg to a stiff froth, adding a little salt. Cover the bread with this, making a little cavity in the center in which place the yolk of an egg; add a little salt and pepper and a small piece of butter and leave in a hot oven until the whites are a delicate brown. Garnish with parsley.

DARK COOKIES, WITHOUT EGGS.—One cup molasses, one cup shortening, two thirds cup brown sugar, one cup sour milk, two teaspoons soda, one teaspoon ginger, one teaspoon salt and flour enough to make a soft dough.

MRS. LILLY WILBER, Ruby, Wis.

INEXPENSIVE SPICED CAKE. (Excellent.)—Break two eggs in pan, add one cup sugar, beat well; one half cup syrup or sorghum, one half cup butter (or less of lard), teaspoon each ginger, allspice, cloves and cinnamon, one teaspoon soda, salt to taste (pinch), stir and beat all together good; add teacup buttermilk, stir briskly until well mixed; add flour until very thick stirring while adding; bake one hour in slow oven.
LILLIE D. ELDRIDGE, Chiricahua, Ariz.

EGGLESS CAKE.—Crumb together one and and one half cups of sugar, two and one half cups of flour, one half teaspoon each nutmeg, cinnamon and allspice, one tablespoon of lard and last of all add one cup of buttermilk or sour milk and one teaspoon of soda.
ANNIE LEWIS, Ager, Cal.

CHOCOLATE CAKE.—One half cup lard, melted, two eggs, well-beaten, one cup sugar, three squares unsweetened chocolate, one half cup flour, one quarter teaspoon salt, one cup chopped nut meats, one teaspoon vanilla. Bake in hot oven twenty minutes.
Subscriber.

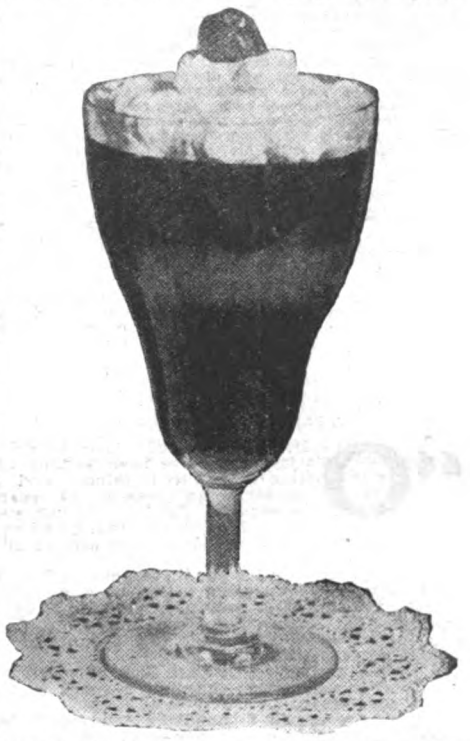
STEAMED APPLE PUDDING.—Mix and sift two cups flour, four teaspoons baking powder and one half teaspoon salt: work in two tablespoons butter, and add three quarters cup of milk, toss on floured board, pat and roll out, place four apples pared, cored and cut in eighths in middle of dough and sprinkle with one tablespoon sugar mixed with one quarter teaspoon each, salt, nutmeg; bring dough around apples and lift into buttered mold. Steam one and one half hours. Serve with sauce.

BAKED APPLES.—Wipe the apples with a damp cloth and remove the cores. Fill the cavity with butter and sugar and sprinkle cinnamon over them. Bake until soft and serve with cream and sugar.

APPLE FRITTERS.—Sift one and one half teaspoons baking powder with one and one third cup of flour, add a little salt, two thirds of a cup of milk, a well-beaten egg and two apples which have been peeled, cored and either chopped or cut into small slices. Drop by spoonfuls into boiling fat and when cooked drain on brown paper and roll in powdered sugar or the sugar may be omitted and the fritters served with any good liquid sauce.

APPLES STUFFED WITH NUTS.—Core the apples. Fill in the space with a mixture of finely chopped nuts, sugar and cinnamon to taste. Bake and serve with whipped cream.
FANNIE V. TIDD, New York, N. Y.

ONE CRUST LEMON PIE.—Use the grated peel and the juice of one lemon. (After grating off peel remove the white, tough covering beneath it, then rub the lemon on the grater until all the juice is pressed out.) To this add one cup of hot water, one teaspoon cornstarch blended with a little water, one cup sugar and boil till it thickens; when cool, add the well-beaten yolks of two eggs. Bake crust separately (pricking it several places with a fork that it may not blister.) When done fill with the lemon jelly and cover with a meringue made of the well-beaten whites of the two eggs, and two tablespoons of sugar. Brown in oven.



MRS. P. S. HENDRY, Loxley, Ala.

CHERRY SPONGE.—One half envelope Granulated Sparkling Gelatine, one half cup cold water, one tablespoon lemon juice, one and one half cups canned cherries, one cup canned cherry juice, one half cup sugar and whites of two eggs. Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes and dissolve in hot cherry juice. Add cherries, stoned and cut in halves, and lemon juice. When mixture begins to set add whites of eggs, beaten until stiff. Turn into mold, first dipped in cold water, and chill. Garnish with whipped cream, sweetened and flavored with vanilla and chopped cherries. Other canned fruits may be substituted for cherries.—Ed.

JELLY ROLL.—Five eggs, two cups sugar, cream together and add a tiny pinch of salt and soda, two teaspoons baking powder, three and one half cups flour and thin down with a cup of boiling water. Bake in layers, spread jelly on while hot and roll.
MRS. J. H. MORRIS, Tuscumbia, Ala.

GINGER COOKIES.—One cup butter, one cup sugar, one cup molasses, one half cup cold coffee, two teaspoons soda and enough flour to make a soft dough. Roll out and bake in a moderate oven.
MRS. J. C. LARIMER, Usk, Wash.

FRUIT CREAM.—Take one box of Granulated Sparkling Gelatine, four lemons, sliced, a little stick of cinnamon, and a pint of cold water. Divide it in halves after adding four cups of sugar. To one half add a half pint of hot currant jelly. To the other half, a half pint of hot water. Strain, place a silver spoon into the bottom of a glass and fill it one third up with the currant liquid. When that is cool add half of the lemon jelly and when set, fill the glass with the currant. Top this with whipped cream and a cherry.

SODA CRACKERS. (Requested.)—To fourteen cups flour add one cup shortening, four teaspoons cream of tartar, two teaspoons soda. Rub these well into the flour, and add three cups water. Work thoroughly, beat with rolling pin; roll thin and sprinkle lightly with salt, rolling salt lightly into dough. Cut in any desired shape and bake in quick oven. Half this recipe makes sufficient quantity for ordinary use.
MRS. RAY R. PINKERTON, Hauser, Oregon.

NERINE'S SECOND CHOICE

by Adelaide Stirling

With a sharp gesture she put Lady Satterlee's soft white fan up across her agonized, whitening face.

Nerine, in her old blue dressing gown, was leaning over the bannisters at the head of the stairs.

"I do not think I am the proper person to tell it to you. Good-night."

Maurice gave utterance to a prolonged whistle.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Lispenard, cousin to Kit Belton's mother, marries a Canadian girl. Dying he leaves a widow, two girls, Agatha and Nerine, and one son Maurice. Mrs. Lispenard marries Clarence Mayne, an interloper. At her decease she leaves Clarence Mayne an income until the girls are of age. Lispenard house and money go to the male heir in the direct line. Clarence Mayne goes on a trip to Monte Carlo, Kit Belton comes on a visit, while Maurice Lispenard, denied the education which is his by right, walks from Liverpool, where he is learning to be a mechanical engineer, to be with Kit Belton. Jones, known to Maurice as Lister, is ordered to harness the horses, when they go to see Lord Satterlee in a game of football. Agatha recognizes him. He has attended St. Jude's that he might see her. Maurice invites Lord Satterlee to dine with him. A young maid, not familiar with the house, and suspicious, leaves him in the darkness. He gropes his way to Clarence Mayne's room, where Nerine finds him later. She picks up a fallen table. In a secret drawer she discovers a book with her mother's initials on it. Nerine and Agatha going for a walk meet Lord Satterlee who hopes to see them at the next dance. Returning to Mr. Mayne's rooms the next day Nerine discovers that they are occupied during his absence and detects a strange woman putting the Lispenard silver in a strong bag. Left alone Nerine substitutes stones and minerals and covers them with her silk skirt. The woman returns, there is a struggle and Nerine falls senseless. Leaving Nerine unconscious, and going to the station with the bag she is met by Jones, who discovers the stones in the place of the silver and hurries the woman away. Returning to the coach-house Jones receives a summons from Maurice, who puts him through a rigid interview. Agatha is suspicious that Mr. Mayne is in the plot. Maurice, with his sisters, calls upon Lady Satterlee who thinks they are alike, yet different. Satterlee admits not knowing one from the other at first. Preparations for the dance go on and Nerine is wildly happy. Lady Satterlee, as hostess, invites the Lispenards and Miss Belton to tea, preparatory to the dance, where Nerine, her heart beating happily, promises Satterlee three extra dances at supper-time, refusing one to Mr. Fairfax, Lady Satterlee's cousin. Dancing one of them, she retires to the dressing-room to arrange her hair. Satterlee, not returning she walks down the passage to another room, and indignant at his apparent neglect and the image of Agatha, is about to leave the room when he enters.

CHAPTER XII.

A BLUNDER IN THE DARK.

"OH, you are here?" Satterlee cried joyfully. "I've been looking after a hundred things, and I haven't an instant to spare now; but Fairfax told me you were here by yourself, and I had to, really had to"—laughing—"come around and speak to you."

"I wasn't waiting for you," she answered, coldly. Was he not even going to say he was sorry?

"Oh, I know that you never did as kind a thing as that for me, but I couldn't go on dancing, talking to stupid people, till I had had at least one more with you."

He came nearer, with that look of open joy on his face which was somehow a shock to his silent companion.

"Were you afraid I should be annoyed?" Her voice was grave against her will. Why could she not bring even the ghost of a smile on her lips?

"I did not know; how could I? But you are not annoyed, are you?"

Was she? She turned away slowly instead of answering him, and stood leaning against the mantelpiece, looking at the fire. Annoyed? If her heart did not beat so frightfully, perhaps she could tell him.

"I ought to be annoyed," she said, unsteadily.

"But you are not?" triumphantly. He was close to her now, and he laid his hand on her shoulder. She could feel it warm and strong through its thin kid glove. "Darling"—how soft, how young his voice was—"you won't send me away for one minute, will you? I had such hard work to find you at all."

"You were long enough about it."

"I know. Some things I had to see to, and I must go now. But not until you turn your head and look at me."

"It is nearly dark; you could not see me."

"I don't need to, Agatha, darling!" He spoke with suppressed emotion—quietly, tenderly.

Agatha!

How she saved herself from giving a tell-tale start, Nerine did not know, but she did so to save herself. She even spoke to him, quite naturally.

"It i not Agatha—it is Nerine." Somehow her lips shaped the words, but, oh! thank heaven for the blessed dark that so nearly hid her face! With a sharp gesture she put Lady Satterlee's soft white fan up across her agonized, whitening face.

So it was Agatha after all. Fool! fool that she was to have ever thought anything else!

"Nerine!"

After that one word, Satterlee stood dumb. A thousand things rushed over him—first and foremost the humbling thought that she had been engaged to him for these very present supper dances, and that on being called away by a servant to speak about some arrangements he had forgotten her and them, totally and utterly.

"I owe you a thousand apologies," he stammered. "I thought you were still in the dressing-room."

"I was cold, so I came here to wait, and the light went out." Not her worst enemy could have heard her voice falter. "You must forgive me if I let you think I was Agatha, you were so certain you could always distinguish us," she added, with a smile more brave than merry.

"You must think me a beast!" he said, remorsefully, "to keep you waiting so long. But I think I am not quite myself tonight. Agatha, half an hour ag said she would marry me, and I am so happy that I am afraid I have forgotten everything else."

"Agatha said she would marry you!" with mechanical repetition. Her heart did not trouble her now by beating too fast; she almost felt as if it had stopped. For the first time she turned and looked him squarely in the face.

"Then I must congratulate you, for there is nobody in the world so nice and dear as Agatha!"

No Lispenard of them all had ever been braver, yet she was thankful again that he could so dimly see her face as he answered her.

"I know. I'm not half good enough for her."

"How did you come to imagine she was here?" with a sudden curious desire to turn the knife in the wound.

"I asked Fairfax if he had seen her, and he said she was here. I wanted"—awkwardly—"just to speak to her for one second, just to make sure that I had not been dreaming."

"And you forgot all about me! Well, I forgive you. I think"—with hidden bitterness—"that while I have been waiting I have been dreaming myself. It got so dark."

Her lip was trembling now with the strain. Another minute more and she would cry. Not she; time enough for such ludicrous self-abuse when she got home to her bed; there would be plenty of leisure then to realize her humiliation, to see how easily she had deceived herself. Why, whenever she should be in want of amusement, through her lifetime, she would only have to look back and see what a ninny she had made of herself during the past month.

"Come," she said. "Let us go and find Agatha." Her voice grew soft as she uttered her sister's name.

Dear Agatha! It had not been her fault, but in spite of herself, the girl's face hardened as she looked at her future brother-in-law. How many times, when talking to her, she wondered, had he been imagining that she was Agatha? Her humiliation turned her cold and sick; the room was close, too, from the smell of the extinguished lamp. With a little imperious motion of her head to Satterlee, which bade him follow, she swept out into the passage.

"Will you dance?" he said, rather meekly, catching up with her, "or come and have some supper?"

Dance! She shivered; perhaps if it had not been for that waltz with him she had not been so near, so horribly near, betraying herself. As for supper, she felt as if she could never eat again; but since one or the other it must be, she would go to supper.

As she entered the crowded supper-room, Lady Satterlee beckoned to her from the far end, where she sat with three or four men waiting on her.

"I thought you were lost," she said, gayly, pushing aside her voluminous skirts to show a chair beside her.

How pale the child looked! What had happened to her pretty color? Too wise to say so, she nodded authoritatively at Fairfax.

"Soup and some champagne, Hughie!" Then she looked at her son. What could Bobby have been doing? Had Nerine refused him? But it took only one glance at his face to make her quite certain that nobody had refused or in any way displeased Bobby.

CHAPTER XIII.

A HUMILIATED MAIDEN.

Nerine looked like an actress who had just finished playing a heavy and exhausting role. If she had been acting, her part was far from being finished. There was the rest of the dance, and they stayed to the very end; there was the long drive home, and, worst of all, there was the getting home.

Arriving at Lispenard House, she raced upstairs in front of the two other girls and banged into her cold bedroom. Would she ever get out of this hateful white satin gown she had been at such pains to procure? Nerine tugged at the hooks and eyes so neatly hidden under her arms. What a blessing that the bodice did not lace and force her to wait for Agatha! She huddled the full skirt and the quaint, big-sleeved bodice into the huge, half-empty wardrobe, grimly glad to get them out of sight. She felt more like her old self when she was wrapped in her shabby old flannel dressing-gown, and pulling the hairpins out of her long, black hair. Presently she would have to talk to Agatha, to Kit; have to echo their raptures over the ball, that festivity of dust and ashes; and there was nothing like brushing out long, thick locks to hide a white and weary face.

She was combing recklessly when Agatha opened the door.

"What! Undressed already?" cried that damsel in languid surprise. "Come along into Kit's room and help me out of my grandeur. Jane has kept up the fire and left hot chocolate on the hob for us."

"Where did she get it?" she asked, unkindly. "Steal it from Mr. Mayne?"

But she moved, brush in hand, to her door; since things must be faced, it might as well be now.

"It's Kit's," Agatha returned. "Do you suppose I would eat Mr. Mayne's things?"

She stepped out into the corridor after Nerine, her white satin skirt held carefully over her arm, and stood transfixed in that draughty passage.

Nerine, in her old blue dressing-gown, was leaning over the banisters at the head of the stairs, her long hair streaming from her bent head like a witch's. From below came the sound of voices in animated conversation. At the well-known and mincing tones of the second voice, Agatha dropped her carefully-held skirts.

"Mr. Mayne!" For a minute she could say no more. She joined Nerine, where she stood in breathless silence, and the two listened.

It was Mr. Mayne. There was no doubt of that, and he and Maurice were now talking in subdued tones in the lower hall.

"Come by the late train, the sly old dog!" Nerine whispered. "And caught us neatly." She leaned over a little more. "They're beginning to quarrel!" She swept her hair from her face and eyed Agatha fairly. "Don't let us have a row just now—you go down!"

"Me? Oh, I can't," beginning to quake. "You know I never can do anything with Mr. Mayne."

"I can, then," Nerine answered grimly. "Come and get me into my dress, Agatha." And she flew back to her room, twisting up her long, black hair as she went.

It took only a minute to get into her gown, and wit the steady light of battle in her eyes she walked down the wide staircase, tall and stately in her fine white frock.

With Agatha's engagement to be announced tomorrow, it would never do to let Mr. Mayne get the upper hand of Maurice tonight. There had been a time when she had quailed before her silken mannered stepfather, but that was over.

She sailed majestically up to the little, carefully-dressed man who stood by Maurice in the dimly-lighted hall, and was for the first time conscious that she towered over him.

"How do you do?" she said, calmly. "I suppose you were surprised to find us all out."

Surprised! Mr Mayne put up his eyeglass in wild amazement at the vision of the confident young woman in white satin who had taken the place of his shrinking and serge-clad stepdaughter. He could absolutely find no voice to greet her.

"Lady Satterlee took us to her son's dance," she pursued; "but if we had expected you tonight we would have left a message for you."

A message! Mr. Mayne staggered mentally.

"I telegraphed to Jones, therefore my rooms were prepared in spite of your—your extraordinary absence," he said, frostily.

"Yes?" she replied, interrogatively and politely, as she seated herself on a stiff oak chair and glanced thoughtfully at her stepfather. "Did Maurice tell you of the—the extraordinary thing which happened in this house during your absence?" she questioned, with precisely the same pause as Mr. Mayne's. "And can you explain it?"

Maurice stepped behind Mr. Mayne, a grin slowly dawning on his perturbed face. Good old Nerine! This was more fun than ten balls.

Mayne dropped his eyeglass, and for a minute was silent. Maurice had told him indeed; so had Jones, and he could explain it only too well. Was the girl's question an arrow in the dark, or had she found out anything? If she had, it was a black outlook for Clarence Mayne. He choked back the sharp retort on his lips, and spoke airily, as was his wont.

"Even I, my dear Nerine, cannot explain the inexplicable." His voice was not quite so even as he could have wished, and he coughed delicately. "Did you—ah—see the thief?" he asked. "Distinctly, I fancy."

There was for one second an ugly gleam in Mr. Mayne's eyes—only for one second—but the girl saw it, and as he looked quickly away from her she drew in her breath softly.

"He is frightened to death! He knows perfectly well who was in his room," she thought, with a flash of insight. "And he will be more frightened before we are done. Your day of small tyranny, my good man, is over in this house."

"I thought Jones might have had something to do with it," Maurice struck in during the pause; "but he swears he hadn't."

Mr. Mayne shook his head with smiling contempt; he had been prepared for this shot.

"Jones is very faithful—to me. I am convinced he had nothing to do with it."

Maurice laughed.

"Poor Jones has been between the devil and the deep sea lately," he said. "But you know more about him than I do, probably!"

"Well," said Nerine, quickly, for things looked too much like open war again, "no one will be able to be in your rooms now that you are back. Had you"—smiling sweetly—"a pleasant journey?"

"Very. A most enjoyable holiday."

If a gun had been fired in Mr. Mayne's ear it could not have caused him a more unpleasant start than did this little indifferent inquiry about his travels. It was a sign of very altered times indeed when Nerine faced him with polite phrases instead of standing before him mute, with downcast eyes, while he made sarcastic comments on her conduct and manners. An uneasiness which had crept over him as he listened to Maurice's story increased hugely at the altered manner of his stepdaughter. He had meant to take a high stand about their lawless doings, about Maurice's being there, and he had been at a white heat of rage at discovering that his emancipated charges had actually gone to a ball. But as he looked at Nerine all his carefully-prepared and cutting rebuke somehow came to nothing; it was he, not Nerine, who stood mute.

"Well, we have plenty of news for you if you have none for us—about the robbery." With a momentary hesitation Nerine rose and went smoothly on. "Come, Maurice, it is time to get to bed. I am tired, and you have to make an early start in the morning."

"You leave, then, in the morning?" Mr. Mayne was relieved.

"Now that you have returned to take charge of my sisters," Maurice answered gravely, and something in his manner, which smacked of increasing years and self-assertion, caused his stepfather a fresh access of that uneasiness.

He would send for Nerine again in the morning and make sure exactly what she had seen; in the meantime should he try to get at what Maurice had meant by that little remark about Jones? He would sleep the better if he knew that that meant nothing.

But it was not fated that his repose should be deepened, for Nerine had touched Maurice on the shoulder, and he was already half way upstairs without even a pretense of saying good night.

"I have more news for you, Mr. Mayne," she said sweetly, "but it will keep till tomorrow. And, besides, I do not think I am the proper person to tell it to you. Good night." And she was gone up the wide staircase.

Mr. Mayne spoke a rough word to himself in a polite undertone, and retired to his own part of the house. He had played a losing game at Monte Carlo and it seemed that he was doing the same thing here. He hugged the meagre shred of consolation left to him by assuring himself that it was fortunate that things were no worse. But it was a futile reflection for he was perfectly aware that he had not the least idea of how much was known by the Lispenards about their unpleasant visitor; and Jones, when questioned, gave replies which were those of Job's comforters, and only increased the uncertainty of his master.

"What do you think of him? Do you think he knows who was in his rooms?" Agatha said breathlessly as Nerine gained the up-stairs hall where she and Maurice stood waiting.

"I think he knows all about it," Nerine answered, "and he is terrified about how much we know."

"What news have you to tell him in the morning, and why are you not the proper person?" Maurice asked, curiously. "By Jove! you did manage him well! I could have shouted, 'Well played!' every time."

"News?" said Nerine. Her color faded a little, but she looked bravely at her brother. "Ask Agatha!" she added, significantly; and then with a suden consciousness of that strange stiffness coming about her mouth which she had felt there once before that night, she put up a swift hand and pulled out the few hairpins which were keeping up her thick hair. It was through that falling veil that she answered Agatha bravely.

"Who told you?"

"Lord Satterlee," gently. "I am so glad you are happy, Agatha!"

Maurice looked sharply at his sisters—one standing pale and beautiful, with her wild hair streaming over her, and the other flushed and confused.

"Don't smirk, Agatha!" he remarked, unkindly. "What does Nerine mean about Satterlee?"

"Tonight he asked me to marry him," Agatha said. "Maurice, you little wretch, how dare you tell me not to smirk?"

Maurice gave utterance to a prolonged whistle.

"Good for Satterlee," he said. "But look here, both of you. I always thought it was Nerine he liked."

If Nerine quivered, neither of the other two saw it.

"That is just where you were remarkably out," she observed, with a kind of grim humor, even through the fresh flood of shame which covered her at the remembrance of how near she had been to open humiliation tonight. She bent over and kissed her sister's cheek. "Wish her joy, Maurice," she said softly, and vanished into her own room to take off, for the second time that night, the white satin gown in the wearing of which she had had so little joy.

She was in bed and the room was quite dark when Agatha arrived from her conversation with Maurice.

"Are you awake?" she said, cautiously approaching the bed. "I wish you would not have your bath-tub left in the middle of the floor," bumping smartly against it. "Shan't I light a candle?"

"Haven't got one," wearily. "We can talk in the dark, Agatha."

"Oh, yes," replied Agatha, resting herself on the bed.

"Maurice is going in the morning, I hope," Nerine said, feverishly. "His presence here is useless while we are having a fuss about your getting engaged."

"Yes, he's going. Tell me, Nerine, were you surprised when he told you?"

"Who—Maurice?" she replied, artfully.

"No," laughing. "You know what I mean."

Nerine twisted her hands hard together in the dark.

"A little surprised," she said, huskily. "I—I didn't know you cared for him."

"You don't mean that you don't think he's nice?" questioned Agatha, anxiously.

Nerine winced.

"No indeed, I think he's charming. I think"—there were tears on her cheeks now, but they did not matter in this blessed darkness—"you are a very lucky girl." Oh! if Agatha would only go away and leave her! What should she do if ture of their own, their own art, and even one song. These spontaneous products of a quick sympathy are not things which every community can hope to duplicate. Some of them can be reproduced, however, for the benefit of everyone. Minneapolis sends this verse:

Baby

(Dedicated to "Baby Week.")

Wee mite of pinkness with rosebud face,
The dew of unborn ages on thine eyes,
The heritage of eons, and the prize
Of kings and prelates. At thine elfin grace
Empires fall. Close in her soft embrace,
Madonna-like, the mother sanctifies
Her earthborn babe in wide-eyed, rapt surmise,
Glimpsing in him the sinews of the race.
A wraith, a gem from out the great unknown,
"A little bit of heaven" sent to men
Down through the rifts of blue, a blossom blown
From fields of asphodel beyond our ken,
Perchance the gates of heaven have slipped ajar,
And thou, the Christ-child's gift, hast come afar.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I am interested in letters on child rearing as I have a baby eighteen months old and I want to rear him right. We have never encouraged him in slapping or fighting but he seems to have a natural inclination to slap, and strike with anything he plays with. I have whipped his little hands to make him stop and also taken toys away from him when he strikes with them, but all to no avail. He also has a habit of biting other children when playing with them. These little habits make it very unpleasant for me when in company where there are children. We have tried various suggestions but with no success. I wish the sisters would advise me. What methods of punishment can I use on a child of his age? He is learning to talk and we think he is very sweet. Some people say, "Let him alone, he will outgrow it." But, as the editor says, it doesn't seem right to allow these habits to become so firmly fixed.

I think Bell's letter was good and if all married people would follow her example there would be less cause for regret.

Mrs. Walter Alverson has asked why so many cannot get along with their mothers-in-law. My answer is—the absence of a correct viewpoint from one or both sides. Often the mother-in-law thinks that because she is older and has had more experience the daughter-in-law should do just as she thinks best, while the daughter-in-law who has been raised differently cannot yield readily to her opinion. On the other hand the daughter-in-law may be arrogant and inclined to treat the mother-in-law's advice with contempt not realizing that we should always respect the advice of our elders. Each should recognize the other as an individual with a right to her own viewpoint on all matters.

I lived in the same house with my father-in-law and mother-in-law for seven years and during that time there was never a jar or cross word between us. She was a woman who always respected my views and never intruded where she was not concerned. She allowed me the privilege of a daughter in household affairs and I always respected her advice and took it on many occasions and I can now see where I was greatly benefited by it. I was miles from my own mother so I looked to her for sympathy and advice and she never failed me. She adopted some of my methods of housework and I adopted some of hers. They are both dead now but I am glad to say I have no regrets in regard to my treatment of either of them. They are greatly missed in our home and we should have despaired indeed if our little golden-haired sunbeam had not been here to cheer us. He was two and one half months old when his grandmother died and our whole attention was turned to him.

We live in the rocky hills of Texas where we raise wheat, oats, corn, maize, cotton and peanuts.

I think every mother should try to make home the most pleasant place for her children. Encourage music, good reading and interesting games. Let them bring their friends home; oversee their games and amusements, taking part when necessary. Be a companion to your children, share their confidences and in times of temptation or trouble they will nearly always come to you. I want to make our home so pleasant that my boy will want to spend most of his time around our cheery hearth.

We take Holland's Magazine, Ladies' Home Journal and COMFORT and we think COMFORT far the best for the money. MRS. H. L. HOLDER.

Mrs. Holder. Children are such imitators that I wouldn't advise slapping your baby's hands to make him stop slapping his playmates' hands, or at least till he is old enough to understand why he is being punished. The chances are that he will stop it of his own sweet will so don't let it worry you; but if any of the sisters have any suggestions to offer we shall be glad to hear from them.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Wasn't it one of COMFORT sisters that suggested raising funds for Uncle Charlie's permanent home? Looks as though he'd enjoy it only in anticipation. It is almost unbelievable that after all this time he has so little money. What is the matter with COMFORT readers any way? If each one gave a penny he'd have sixty thousand dollars. I'm sure many subscribers have fine farms and heavy bank deposits. Write out a check for one thousand and send him. Send it now, Mr. Tight Wad, if you never gave anything for the relief of human woe, try it and see how you feel. You will have the greater benefit. Oh, yes, you all love Uncle Charlie, but honeyed words will not buy food, clothes or shelter. Father's hired man once lost a valuable cow. Several men met and expressed sympathy. Father said: "I'm sorry five dollars. How sorry are the rest?" They got him another cow and that is the right kind of pity, one that helps.

"It's possible we may have war with foreign countries; New York and Brooklyn might be burned. Uncle Charlie couldn't flee. Let him have a home in the country safe from invasion, where he can enjoy the bountiful gifts of nature. He has earned more than one hundred thousand dollars. I wish I had a million to send him, for I'd know many other unfortunates would be benefited. If he doesn't get fifty thousand dollars before his next birthday, I'll ask Billy Sunday to give one exhibition of his contortions for the benefit of Uncle Charlie. See if I don't! ALICE MANN SANDERLY.

GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I would like the remedy for rupture, made of egg.

I want to tell you something I thought of. Last year in March I said to myself, "In a few days I will be sixty years old, threescore years, and I may live to be threescore and ten. I will take a motto and live up to it every day and see what comes of it in the ten years." So I chose "Little Deeds of Kindness," and every evening I wrote in a book every little deed of kindness I had performed during the day. At the end of the year I had such a bulky book that I didn't want anyone to read it so I burned it and this year I am keeping it like this:

January 1, 1917, did 20 acts of kindness, Cost $——
January 2, 1917, did 12 acts of kindness, Cost $——

You see, "little deeds of kindness" is better than "big deeds of kindness" because it is impossible to do great things. One good deed to myself, by doing this I am thinking all the time of what I can do for others and it crowds out wanting something done for myself—and it is really casting bread upon the waters. To do is my part and because of this record I do more. One day I returned home about six o'clock. If I had not been keeping this record, after eating my evening meal I would have gone to bed and read myself to sleep, but I was not satisfied with my day so I made haste and called at a home where there are little children and carried some fresh eggs to them. Then I called to see a widow who is an invalid and on the way I walked with a hard-working woman and talked to her in a cheery manner. Then I invited a boy to spend the evening with my family. His mother is dead and he has no one to admire him, particularly as he is deformed. Now these little deeds were appreciated but would not have been done except for my motto. I am telling you all this because I find it is a pleasant way to pass one's time, and because it is more blessed to give than to receive. I feel much more independent than I would if I waited for attentions to be shown me. My time is filled thinking of what attentions I can give.

With many thanks for all the help you have given me in your letters to COMFORT,

Sincerely, MRS. GREEN.

Mrs. Green. You can't make me believe that you waited till you were nearly sixty years old before you thought of this little-deeds-of-kindness stunt; I think you have been doing these good deeds all your life but maybe just found it out. Don't the sisters agree with me?—Ed.

ILLINOIS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a subscriber to COMFORT nearly twenty-one years and this is my first attempt to pen a line to the best of all papers.

I want to ask the bride of a month, whose letter appeared in December COMFORT if she will not come again and tell us COMFORT sisters how her husband made that glass prism. Give size; does it stand or hang up, and where glass may be obtained; in fact, tell us all about it. I for one would thank her very much.

With best wishes to the COMFORT family,

MRS. M. F. M.

NEBRASKA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a silent reader of COMFORT for over ten years and I enjoy it much but most of all the Sisters' Corner and Uncle Charlie's department.

I am interested in "Lonely One." If it is possible for you to bear children it is your duty and you will be glad if you do. There is nothing so sweet as a little child. You can surely control your nerves for it is not so nerve racking as you seem to think, at least I do not think so. Really the months won't seem so long if you put in your time pleasantly and profitably. Don't worry over anything and do your work as pleasantly and as easily as you can. Fancy-work and music are good to help pass the time away. I wish I knew your address, so I could write to you. You might love an orphan dearly but not as you would one of your own. It is one of the sweetest things in the world to hear them say "Mamma." I do not believe in too large a family; but I do think it is every woman's duty to have children, unless it is impossible, and that is a time to trust in God. He will see you through.

I am twenty-seven years old and have a little girl three and one half years old and a dear little boy just a little over a year old. Husband and I think they are the best in the world and you mothers, of course, think the same of yours.

I do not believe in divorces unless absolutely necessary. I am in favor of votes for women and will surely vote if ever I get the chance.

I enclose a little verse I love. Good by and God bless you all.

"Only a baby small, dropt from the skies,
Only a laughing face, two sunny eyes,
Only two cherry lips, one chubby nose,
Only two little hands, ten little toes,
Only a golden head, curly and soft,
Only a tongue that wags loudly and oft,
Only a little brain, empty of thought,
Only a little heart troubled with naught,
Only a tender flower sent us to rear,
Only a life to love while we are here,
Only a baby small, never at rest,
Small but how dear to us, God knoweth best."

"Happy Mother."

Happy Mother. All your advice is good and I am sure will be much appreciated by Lonely One and for her further benefit I am adding a few words on exercise, which I have taken from Uncle Sam's booklet on Prenatal Care.—Ed.

It should be the invariable practise of every pregnant woman to spend at least two hours of each day in the open air, and as much more as possible. If the weather is pleasant, walking is a valuable form of exercise, if taken leisurely and not continued to the point of weariness. Women who have previously been accustomed to active out-of-door lives should modify their habits sufficiently to avoid fatiguing and dangerous sports; those who have previously led quiet indoor lives will find it wise to begin their open-air exercise very moderately. Easy gardening work is a good form of exercise and diverts the mind agreeably, but it must be merely an amusement, not a compelling task. Pleasant open-air occupations invigorate the muscles, stimulate the sweat glands and other excretory organs, strengthen and restore the nervous tissues, clear the brain, increase the heart action, and send a greater supply of blood to all parts of the body, thus promoting the digestion and assimilation of food, renewing the mental and moral health, increasing courage and cheerfulness, and finally develop character itself. There is nothing that takes the place of out-of-door life. If the day be cold or stormy enough to preclude going out, a walk may be taken on the porch, or at least in a room with the windows wide open; but in some form or other it should be taken until near the end of pregnancy, when it may become wearisome to the point of real fatigue.

There is a present-day tendency, with the greatly increased interest in sports of all sorts, to forget that a pregnant woman, while needing exercise, must conserve her strength and build it up, not tear it down with violent or exhausting forms of activity. Since the majority of women are busy during part of the day with their household duties, and many have more than they can do comfortably, they may often derive greater benefit from sitting quietly out in the fresh air, if the weather is suitable, and resting while they sew, read, or chat. One of the less obvious but equally important results of this out-of-door life is the amount of mental diversion which it affords. The sights and sounds of the open often induce a happy change of view and take the pressure off the overworked nerves even in the presence of genuine cause for worry.

BIGSTONE GAP, VA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

As I always like to have at least a vague idea of how a person looks, I will describe myself. I am sixteeen years old, have blue eyes, fair complexion, golden-brown hair and weigh—but I will leave that for the sisters to guess.

I live in the pretty town of Bigstone Gap, Va., which has a population of between three and four thousand. The town is situated in a valley between two mountains, and the scenery is beautiful. The climate also is very pleasant.

Why won't more of the sisters discuss the divorce question? I think it is one of the greatest evils our country has to face. I can hear some good sister say, "You are young and little folks should be seen and not heard." True; nevertheless, we "little folks" [illegible] to be the "big folks" some day so if we [illegible] in our minds now the right course, we [illegible] sure to make mistakes later on.

[illegible] ou ll have heard the quotation, "A woman makes the home and home makes the man." A beautiful house is not always a beautiful home. I have been walking along with people who would exclaim, "Oh, what a beautiful home!" I have thought at such times, "It may be a beautiful home and it may not be. It is not a home at all, unless perfect love, perfect happiness and perfect peace holds court there. Not a home unless the wife is interested in all of her husband's trials, cares and worries, business success or failure. Sharing each other's joys and sorrows alike. Going hand in hand along life's hard, rugged road, but conscious of a lighter heart because that in all their joys there is someone to share them; in all sorrows, someone to help bear them."

I would be glad to hear from the sisters, especially those living on claims in the West.

Your COMFORT sister, VERDA SPROLES.

JENERA, OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

We live in the country three quarters of a mile south of Jenera on a three-acre truck farm. My father is a painter and is busy most of the time. He also does interior finishing and varnishing. I don't think I would like to live in the city. I prefer a small town or village where one can keep a cow, a few chickens and have a garden. Like one of the sisters, I think the city has its advantages but it seems the temptation to do evil is greater there and there is more danger of one becoming a "swell head."

I like to do tatting and other fancy-work but I don't spend all my time at it though for I can do housework. My parents believe in teaching us to work and I think they are right. So many mothers do all the housework and let their daughters play or go

How to Use Eggs in Cooking

By Mary Harrod Northend

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

In making frosting, the white of the egg only is used; mix it stiffly with sugar and use water to soften it.

AS a food, eggs, cannot be over-estimated. If the frugal housewife remembers this fact, she will take great care that there is always an abundance in the house. During warm weather, it is a very easy matter as the hen keeps you well supplied with eggs, but in the winter season they become scarce. This fact makes it advisable to lay them down in water glass (can be gotten at the druggist) to meet emergency cases such as this.

In comparing their percentage of nourishment, with other foods, one should bear in mind that they rank next to milk and cheese. In addition to the albumin they contain, one finds fat, phosphate, potash and lime in their composition. One egg, is equal to five ounces of fat meat and it is much more easily digested. In its cooking there is no need of sameness, for nothing lends itself to such a great variety of usage as this.

There are so many different and attractive dishes they can be used for, that it is with difficulty one chooses. For breakfast or tea, there are the poached eggs, and the boiled, both of which, if rightly cooked are appetizing, as well as the omelet. Then there are the innumerable uses for eggs in cakes and desserts, and as a rule the more eggs in the recipe the richer the food product. But one serious objection to the liberal use of eggs in cooking at all times is their scarcity and high cost at certain seasons of the year when they become an expensive luxury to people of moderate incomes, and, as a certain gentleman was wont to remark, "they taste too strong of money." At such times one can economize without sacrifice by substituting desserts made with gelatine, and there are recipes for making cake with less eggs by using a pure, high-grade baking powder.

Fill your kettle with hot water and drop an egg into every compartment. One advantage of this is that they easily slip off and do not burn.

Great care should be taken in the making and baking of custards. The heat of the oven must be considered, for unless moderate it is apt to burn. Far better results are obtained if a shallow tin dish is placed in the oven partly filled with water and into which the cups are set. If you find they are baking too quickly a cap of white paper will prevent scorching. To properly test as to whether they are done insert the blade of a knife down to the bottom of the cup and if when you bring it up it is dry rest assured it is fit to take from the oven.

Four eggs to a quart of milk, is a rule that brings the best results in the making of this particular dessert. Boiled custards are much smoother if the yolks only are used, although sometimes a little gelatine or corn-starch helps out the thickening. This is an idea to be remembered, when eggs are scarce and bring prohibitive prices. Too much care cannot be taken with the beating. There should be just enough so that the egg proper does not string and one should bear in mind, that over beating has the effect of curdling the custard.

BOILED OR BAKED CUSTARD.—Milk, two cups; eggs, four; sugar, one quarter of a cup; salt, one eighth of a teaspoonful; nutmeg.

Scald the milk, beat the egg until slightly frothy, add sugar, salt and nutmeg, and mix well. Add the scalded milk, slowly stirring all the time, strain the mixture into either a buttered pudding dish or cups, place this in a pan of hot water, this can be steamed or boiled, if the former is desired, the dish or cup, can be placed, in a steamer, over a saucepan containing boiling water, being covered while it cooks. In case of the latter, it can be done in a double boiler. It should be flavored with vanilla.

For boiled eggs use an egg stand that will hold them while boiling and save danger of breaking when they are taken out.

CHOCOLATE CUSTARD. — Chocolate, one quarter of a cake, grated; boiling water, one pint; eggs, four; milk, one quart; sugar, one half cup; vanilla, two teaspoonfuls.

Dissolve the chocolate in the water and stir into the boiling milk letting it stay for three minutes. When nearly cold add the beaten eggs with sugar, saving out one white for frosting. Flavor and pour into a mold. When served it should be decorated with the white of egg, stiffly beaten to which is added a little powdered sugar.

SPINACH AND EGGS.—Spinach should be used perfectly fresh, washed in several waters, so that all dirt should be removed. Put in boiling water with a small piece of pork and let it boil quickly for twenty minutes. Season with butter, salt and pepper. Serve it in individual rounds topped with a hard boiled egg.

SPANISH POACHED EGGS.—Have ready an earthen dish large enough to be placed over a moderate fire. For four eggs allow a piece of butter half the size of a small egg. When it is hot, add a tablespoonful of onion, mince very fine and half as much minced parsley. When the onion is yellow and tender break in the eggs slipping them one by one from a flat saucer. Baste with the butter, slip them over as soon as set. Lift to a hot dish with a pancake turner and turn the butter, minced onion and pepper over them. Salt to taste, the butter must never get so hot as to scotch.

OMELET.—Omelets are easy to make and are inexpensive. Beat the whites and yolks separately using three eggs, a half cup of milk, and a half tablespoonful of butter. Mix yolks, milk, butter, salt and pepper, adding the whites last, folding them in stiffly beaten. The pan must be hot, butter being used, put the omelet in and when it browns underneath the top will be a foamy mass; sometimes it is found advisable to put the pan in the oven to dry the top before folding over, to send to the table. Some cooks claim that water is better to use instead of milk as it makes the omelet more tender. When this is done there should be one tablespoonful to each egg. If you wish a variation a little minced ham, a few spoonfuls of peas or stewed corn can be used, while fruit omelets are simply delicious.

In making cake hit your egg against the side of the dish or else crack it with a knife to break it.

LEMON CUSTARD PIE.—Take one cup of sugar, one heaping tablespoonful of flour which has been sifted, grated rind and juice of one lemon, yolks of two eggs, pinch of salt, a cup of milk, pour this into a crust and bake it. This should be frosted with the whites of two eggs, into which a little powdered sugar has been added. This should be ornamented with raisins previously soaked in hot water to swell.

POACHED EGGS.—Poached eggs are so dainty and delicious, that they should be frequently served. Have the water in the pan boiling and salted. An egg-poacher is a great convenience, or muffin rings may be used and an egg dropped into each. This will keep them nicely in shape, as half the art of cooking a poached egg is to keep it perfectly round, without any jagged edges. A valuable hint when there are no rings at hand, is to stir the water in the pan round and round, in one direction. When going quite swiftly drop the egg and all the white will be drawn round in the whirl and form the egg into a perfect ring. Another idea is to put a very little vinegar into the water, as it has been proven that this assists in keeping the egg nicely in shape. Prepare a slice of butter toast, keeping it hot, remove the egg with a skimmer, drain, slip on the toast, add salt, pepper, and butter to taste and serve immediately.

LIVER AND EGGS.—Take calve's liver, wash it thoroughly and cut it into small pieces, season with salt and pepper, dredge with flour and fry in butter. When well browned stir in a tablespoonful of butter and gradually a cup of boiling water, boil until it thickens and serve on a platter, placing on top poached eggs.

POTATO AND EGGS.—Boil potatoes until tender, drain and shake by open door for a minute, this is to make them mealy, mash thoroughly with a potato masher, add a good-sized piece of butter, salt to taste and a cup of milk. Beat well with a large spoon; if they do not seem to get very light, add more butter, and a little more milk. Do not be afraid of adding too much milk. Form them into a mould and serve them with hard-boiled eggs in the center.

Won't Mamma be S'prised?

This isn't a fancy picture. Mamma has gone down town shopping. Nan, Betty and Bobbie are afraid she will not be back in time to make the promised Jell-O dessert for dinner, so they are making it themselves.

As has already been explained in Comfort, Jell-O is so easily made up that a child can do it.

JELL-O

makes up into the most delicious desserts and salads, and, as it costs only ten cents, is coming to be as generally used in small-town and farm homes as in the city, where it is immensely popular.

In every Jell-O package there is a little folder containing rules, suggestions and recipes for making up Jell-O in all possible forms.

There are seven flavors of Jell-O: Strawberry, Raspberry, Lemon, Orange, Cherry, Peach, Chocolate. Each 10 cents at any grocer's or any general store.

The flavors are pure fruit flavors and the full strength of the flavors is preserved by the air-tight and moisture-proof waxed-paper Safety Bags enclosing the Jell-O inside the cartons.

The price has never changed. It is ten cents to-day just as it has been from the beginning.

The 1917 Jell-O Book is the most beautiful ever issued and it contains more useful information for housewives than any other. Send us your name and address and we will mail you one of the books.

Her Veteran of '98

FLORELLA GIRARD looked up from her book and listened attentively, then satisfied that the oncoming steps were not those of her expected visitor, she tried to resume her reading, but her thoughts wandered from the printed page.

"I hope Captain Edwards will not disappoint us," she mused, as she glanced at the empty porch chair on the other side of the little table at which she sat, under the blue and white striped awning. "Well, perhaps he was delayed, and Spencer said he surely would not disappoint us, so I expect I must wait with patience."

She closed her book, and thumped it down on the little table, then lounged comfortably in her own porch chair. She made a pretty picture as she sat there with the sunlight sparkling in the dew upon the lawn all about her. Her simple, yet elegant gown of white, which gave her an individual style, would have charmed an artist and made him desire to paint the picture she unconsciously posed for.

She was awaiting the coming of her brother's captain. Captain Melvin Edwards, under whom Spencer Girard had served during the Spanish-American War. The town's last veteran of the Civil War had been buried within the last twelve months, therefore Captain Edwards was invited to the Memorial Day Exercises, "to give dignity to the affair," Spencer said.

Spencer, after he was mustered out at the close of the Phillipine War in 1902 had lost sight of Melvin Edwards, and it was only a year or so ago that he again met him. The meeting was a mutual pleasure, and Spencer gave Edwards a standing invitation to make his home his whenever he happened to be in Rennerton. And since this last meeting, Spencer was never tired of singing the praises of his former captain, telling how he had intended that their friendship should never be broken, but somehow its intimacy had been, because of their living in different states. And he again recited the stories of the several occasions on which Captain Edwards had saved his life in Phillipino skirmishes.

All this, Florella listened to with great interest, for at the time of the Spanish-American War she was a little girl of six, and was now twenty-five. Her brother, Spencer, was thirty-four, and had been a mere boy when he volunteered his services in '98. Florella remembered but vaguely those times, her most vivid impression being of the time when Spencer had kissed her good by, and went away wearing a suit quite different from that he usually wore.

She realized what it meant now, and her esteem for old Captain Edwards grew when she tried to realize what life would have been without her big, merry, teasing brother.

Captain Edwards had been the topic of conversation in the Girard nome for some days back, and Florella was content to wait for him this morning after the rest of the family had gone off to the cemetery for the exercises. It would be quite proper since the captain was somewhere near seventy years of age, Spencer said.

That young man would have waited for his old friend, but he was to be very busy that morning at the cemetery, he was slated for a speech, and besides he had an army of young boy scouts to take care of, and in whom he took a great interest. To them he was their hero because of his active participation in the Spanish-American War. "But Captain Edwards would understand," he said, and so he was off quite early.

For some time Florella sat, the wind blowing her soft gown about her beautiful figure, and playing a dreadful game of fascination with those tender wavy strands of her brown hair about her temples. High above her flapped Old Glory, tugging at its ropes with a ceaseless drone as the wind tossed it to the breeze.

And still Florella waited.

"I expect he'll be tired and thirsty when he comes. I must get him something to drink. I wonder what? I suppose he drinks high-balls and whiskey straight—all old captains do. Well, he won't get any here!" she determined, "but I'll make him some cooling lemonade. That will be better, and I'll allow him the indulgence of brandied cherries, but nothing more! I might get everything ready, while I wait," she continued. "I suppose he smokes. Well, so does Spencer, so I won't deprive the Captain of the luxury."

She got up and went into the house, a stately old place which seemed to rise from a bed of blooming lilac and snowball bushes. A great part of the flowering crowns had been given to the school children to decorate the graves of their heroes who slept in the quiet cemetery on the hill.

Florella secured the ingredients for the concoction, then went to her brother's den and brought out his cigar jar and match case, and put it on the tray with the rest of the things.

"Now, no one can say that I do not know how to appeal to an old man's comfort," she thought, as she surveyed her work. "I wonder, though, why he doesn't come? And being old and feeble, I suppose he'll want to rest before we go to the celebration. In such case, I'm afraid we'll miss it altogether."

She went out on the lawn again, and again tried to interest herself in her novel. But she could not, and every sound made her look up.

"It's odd that the Captain didn't say how he'd come, whether by train or motor," she thought. "Well, I suppose I must continue to wait," and she looked longingly in the direction that the cemetery lay. She could not see it, but she had heard at intervals the liquid notes of a bugle, and could see the big flag waving, a mere pocket handkerchief in the distance.

At that moment, came the soft purr of a motor. It increased in volume until with a roar, a big automobile tore up before the house at breakneck speed, and stopped with a [illegible]rish.

From it descended a young fellow [illegible] bearing, clad in a khaki uniform. He [illegible] some sort of decoration on his shoulders, but they passed Florella's observation. He was immensely tall, and didn't look to be more than about twenty-nine or thirty years of age. His eyes were black and snapping, and his hair didn't look as if it had been combed that morning. It was very evident that he had driven bare-headed.

He was examining the house curiously, as a stranger not sure that his directions are correct, then as Florella saw him and started down the lawn, he sprang over the foot high stone slab that formed the fence, and came toward her with all the grace of a gentleman born.

"Beg pardon," he began, "is this Spencer Girard's home?"

"Yes, he lives here, but he is not at home at present. He's gone to the cemetery where they are holding the usual Memorial Day exercises. You can easily find the way there, and ask for Spencer. Anyone will point him out to you."

The soldier looked at her with a rather bold, admiring glance.

"I am a friend of Spencer's. May I suggest that you go with me? Spencer will vouch for me."

"I should like to oblige you," Florella replied, "but it is not possible at this moment. You see, we are expecting Captain Edwards and Spencer has asked me to wait for him here and then take him to the cemetery. The Captain is old and of course it would hardly be generous to him to come and find us all gone. I am certain he will come, for he promised to telegraph if he could not."

"Ah," the soldier breathed. "Then you need wait no longer. I come from Captain Edwards. He is ill—only slightly—but felt unable to make the trip, so I promised to carry his message and regrets to Spencer. I was to drive him here in my machine, you see."

"Oh, I understand. Then we can go at once, for the exercises are well under way. Just a moment, I'll get my things. In the meantime, won't you rest?" and Florella led the way to the reclining porch chairs between which the little wicker table stood.

"I know you are thirsty, so I'll make you some lemonade, if you care for anything so weak."

"Indeed, I should so appreciate it," he replied.

She went into the house and brought out her tray, and put it down upon the little table. She felt his brilliant black eyes follow her every movement from the moment she whizzed the seltzer into the glass until she handed the finished beverage to him.

He took it with a grateful, pleased sigh, and drained the glass almost at one sip.

"My, that was good," he said, "and I was so thirsty. And now, may I dare this?" and he picked up one of the cigars.

"Certainly," she replied. "They are Spencer's so I expect they're all right. Christmas is long gone."

He smiled, showing his clean white teeth, understanding her reference to the eternal joke of a woman's inability to select cigars. Then he lit the weed and leaned back in the comfortable chair under the flapping canvas shade.

"I don't know but what I'd rather linger here until Spencer returns, but that wouldn't be generous to you. Would you mind lingering a bit? I am tired and sitting at the wheel as I have done since six o'clock this morning is rather a strain, you know."

"I am in no particular hurry," Florella answered, feeling that somehow there was something very boyish and pleasant about the young man, though now as she stole several furtive glances at him, when his eyes were turned from her, she felt that he was considerably older than her first judgment of twenty-nine or thirty years; more likely he was nearer thirty-six. But a man with those laughing features never could appear old, nor would age ever squelch the teasing, sparkling light in his eyes.

"I'm afraid the youngsters will be disappointed when they find that the gray-haired old veteran they expected didn't come," he began, as crossing his feet, one over the other, he exhaled the smoke through his nostrils in a manner very picturesque.

"Perhaps. Of course, we have plenty of veterans of '98, but a Civil War veteran is more interesting, though a bearded, white-haired soldier of '98 would make a very worthy substitute, I think," she smiled at him.

He laughed. "It is very true. Have you never met Captain Edwards?"

"No, but I was so anxious. I almost believe I love the old man for he was so extremely kind to and thoughtful of Spencer. Odd too, when he was so much older—Spencer says the Captain is nearly seventy—but perhaps he had a sort of fatherly feeling for Spen, and everybody loves my brother! I knew nothing of the Captain until just recently, shortly after Spencer met with his commanding officer, about a year ago. I seem to remember vaguely, that Spencer did mention Captain Edwards after he returned from service in the Phillipines, but I was only ten years old then." She smiled at having betrayed a woman's secret, and continued: "Have you figured out my age?" and then without waiting for his reply, she went on:

"Spencer has been recounting to me all the good offices the Captain performed for him. Once when he was mixed up in a scrimmage with the insurrectos, Spencer was wounded. Captain Edwards seized a club from the villain who was going to brain Spencer and treated the Phillipino to his own medicine. On another occasion, he dragged Spencer from a battle-field to safety, then carried him on his shoulders to the rear. Those are just two instances of the fine things he's done for my brother. "Now," and she smiled into the face seen between the thin smoke, so calm and possessed, "do you wonder that I was so anxious to see him? We all owe him a debt of gratitude, and would have made him see it had he come today. Spencer never forgot him, and I'm afraid, much as I dislike to say it, it was the Captain who lost sight of Spencer for Spen tells me that he wrote several letters which were returned unclaimed. It seems a bit queer that so old a man should go jaunting about like a soldier of fortune, doesn't it, Mr. ——" she paused, as she, for the first time, discovered that she did not know the name of the stranger before her.

But he supplied it. "Private Turk," he said.

"Private Turk?" she repeated, a little puzzled.

"You spell it T-u-r-c-k," he informed.

She acknowleged the name, then Private Turck replied:

"The Captain never married, is wealthy in a fair degree, and so devotes a great deal of his time to traveling. That is probably why." He put down the half-smoked cigar and held out his hand to her.

"I know Captain Edwards as well, pretty nearly, as I know myself, and I cannot but offer you my hand and thank you in his name for the high compliments you have paid him. Captain Edwards would indeed, be blessed in the love of such a girl."

He rose as he extended his hand, and as Florella allowed hers to be lost in his, a thrilling sensation pervaded her, such as never before in her life had she experienced. She loved Spencer, she loved his teasing manner of caressing her and kissing her lips, she felt a pleasurable thrill when her hand was clasped by young men of her set on those friendly occasions when a hand-clasp is given, but what magnetism was there in this man's blood that so roused, that so called to hers? What was it that this stranger with the atrocious name of Turck had done in his mere hand-clasp?

But she knew, and knew too well. A fiery blush mantled her cheek, and she was glad that she had her wrap as an excuse for going into the house.

"Oh, why did he come?" she murmured to herself, afraid for herself and her mind's peace.

But she calmed herself, and when she came out of the house again, carrying a cloud of chiffon that was to be service as a wrap, she was able to smile carelessly.

"Is the cemetery very distant?" Turck queried, as she reached his side, and they started for the automobile.

"Oh, no, it is a comfortable walk," she returned.

"Then would you mind walking? I'd so much rather, for I've been cramped in that seat all the morning."

"I'm sure I'll not mind," she answered.

"Thank you. Then I'll put my machine in your garage if I may."

She nodded her consent, and he did so, and in a few moments more joined her, and together they slowly sauntered along under the lovely May sunshine which sparkled and reflected in the new green of the trees.

Mr. Turck seemed in no hurry to get to his destination and seemed perfectly satisfied to loiter dreadfully, but at length they turned into the road which ran by the town cemetery which lay in calm peace upon the warm, sunny slope of a hill. As they turned into the road, they caught a glimpse of the place, the big flag floating above, while below, spread out on the hill a mass of black, tan and white, which, as they approached, grew into individual boy scouts, white dressed lassies and more soberly garbed grown-ups.

They were suddenly startled by a cry which arose from the cemetery. In a moment more they knew the cause of it, for tearing wildly down the road, a horse came plunging, while upon his back, clinging tenaciously, was its rider.

Florella, terrified, gazed upon the dreadful spectacle, then shrieked:

"Oh, heaven! It's Caprice! How did Spencer lose control of him?"

She could not answer, knowing how careful her brother generally was. As a matter of fact, though, the runaway had been caused simply enough. A large sheet of paper which had been blowing about the cemetery had been carried up by the breeze and flung into the restive broncho's face. He, but recently broken, and still needing careful watching, gave way to fright and the natural impulse to run, and tore madly down the little by-path and into the main road.

Spencer, who had, for a moment, relaxed his usual vigilant care of Caprice, was taken unaware, and was flung back in the saddle losing his equilibrium. His only hope was to cling to the raging horse's back, which he did, clasping his legs about the trunk, and clinging there, endeavoring all the while to stay on the plunging horse's back, and regain control of him.

Luckily no one was hurt by the horse's mad dash, for Spencer, thoughtful as he always was, had warned the admiring lads away from a too close proximity to the restive Caprice.

And that was how it happened.

At Florella's cry, Mr. Turck's face, which, at the prospect of the oncoming horse, had brightened with excitement, went white for a moment, then he sprang into the road and awaited the horse. Then as the frightened brute drew close, he made one spring, caught the bridle, and lifting himself from his feet, he drew his whole weight on the horse's head. The excited creature, balked, curveted blindly, then Spencer, realizing what had happened, in a moment swung up into the saddle, and grabbed the reins. The horse, now utterly bewildered, rearing up straight on his haunches, while Spencer clung to the reins, when suddenly the strap to which Turck clung snapped, and he was hurled into the ditch at the side of the road.

A major portion of the folk at the cemetery had started after the runaway horse, followed by the squad of boy scouts. They now came up. Spencer slipped from the back of Caprice and gave him into the charge of a dozen willing hands, and sprang to the side of the figure huddled in the dry ditch.

"Turk, old boy," he cried, with tears in his voice, "Turk, old lad!" He raised him up and leaned him against his knees, and brushed the thick hair from his friend's forehead.

But Mr. Turck had only been stunned, and he now sat up bewilderedly, then smiled, a little vaguely.

"Say, you've got some brute there!" he exclaimed. "Don't you know now to break horses yet?"

His speaking evidently took away most of Spencer's fears, for turning to his squad of boy scouts, he commanded that they take charge of their wounded brother.

The lads did so with a will—it was much more interesting to have a real subject for their ministrations.

"Too bad, boys, that you don't have to carry me off on a stretcher, but I guess I'd be a pretty heavy load. Thanks, nevertheless," and he tried to rise to his feet. But he had given his ankle a nasty wrench, which made walking impossible.

So he was assisted to the back of the now sobered Caprice, and escorted to the Girard homestead in great state, at the gates of which, the squad lined up and saluted as Mr. Turck went by.

When he was comfortably seated at the little wicker table again and had had his ankle bound up by the boy scouts, who after their attendance, retired to a little distance and set up temporary camp, Spencer came up where Florella and Turck sat. Except for a few slight wrenches which made him wince now and then, Spencer had escaped without injury.

Glancing from his sister to Mr. Turck, he said: "Well, Flo, how do you like this veteran of '98 of mine? The Captain seems to have a penchant for saving my life, doesn't he?"

"Spencer!" and her shriek was so indefinable that the man of thirty-four sprawled out on the grass and kicked up his heels in sheer joy.

"Ye gods," he managed to ejaculate, "is this the awakening? Don't you know that this hero before you is Captain Edwards?"

"No," she returned, prettily petulant, "no, I don't. I think it is dreadful of you, Spencer, to mislead me as you did, and of you, Captain Edwards not to make yourself known to me, and allow me to say things of you because I thought you were a man of seventy. How could you call yourself 'Private Turck!'"

"'Private Turk!'" howled Spencer. "We used to call him 'Turk' because once he was dared to snatch the little fez from a Turk's head which he did, though the fellow went after him with a cutlass! And he introduced himself as Private Turck, and you never got wise to these," and he patted the small cross-straps tenderly.

"I think it dreadfully mean of you both." Florella announced, "and I shall not stay here another moment," and she rushed into the house, her cheeks burning.

And indeed, they might. As she recalled her high praises of Melvin Edwards, of her declaration that she believed she loved the man who had been the tried companion of her brother, and now suddenly confused by the thought that the brave captain and the picturesque soldier before her were one and the same, the fact that more than ever now, was she drawn to the captain by a cord of love, was more than she could at the present, with composure, bear.

As she ran, she heard her brother's pleased laughter, and as it rang in her ears, she felt as if she almost hated him.

She refused to go down to lunch, and it was only in the afternoon, after she saw her brother take the Captain in their auto for a drive about the country that she dared go down-stairs.

She stole out upon the lawn and to a little arbor where she sat in a maze of terror and of joy of what had happened.

She sat there until the sun was beginning to sink toward the horizon.

Suddenly her reverie was disturbed by a boyish voice, which piped up:

"Miss Florella?"

She looked up. It came from one of the boy scouts.

"Yes, my lad?"

"Lieutenant Girard says we could take down the flag this evening, and it's time, but he ain't come yet. May we go and do it without waiting for him? 'Cause it is time to break camp."

"You surely may," she responded, and then as Old Glory floated slowly down from the mast, the boyish figures straightened up and saluted.

Florella watched them, the lads always interested her. Then they saluted her, and marched off, leaving her sitting alone in the dusky sunshine.

As she sat, a figure approached her from the rear, straight and tall, but with a little limp. But so quietly he came that she was unaware of his coming until he was beside her, and had slipped his arm about her waist.

She turned startled, and sought to flee.

"Don't." Captain Edwards said masterfully, but with a tone that thrilled her, and made her want to obey his command, "don't!" "You are not angry, are you?"

The pleading eyes in which she looked seemed to fascinate her with a fascination that was lovely to experience.

"You don't know that I've known you for a long time, from the time Spencer first told me about the little sister of six that he had left behind. I forgot about you after the war—to let you grow up, you see. And then when I met Spencer again, he showed me your picture. I declared you must be his sweetheart, but he assured me the picture was that of his sister. I demanded the supreme test—that he give the picture to me. He did, and that convinced me. I always carried that picture with me, and took it to my heart, and soon I learned to love the original of it. Spencer knew, for I told him. He likes me and is willing to welcome me as a brother if I am fortunate enough in winning you. I believe you said you loved the man who saved that dear, teasing big brother of yours. Perhaps you thought that because you fancied him a fatherly old man. Does the fact that your veteran of '98 is still a fairly young chap, still full of the ideals of life, still a believer in rainbows and air castles, drive that admiration and love from your heart? I couldn't help teasing you—is that Spencer and I are one. Have I a right to hope, Flo? You need not tell me your answer now,

My Mother—and Yours

By Mabel S. Keightly

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

WHEN we read of the bravery of the titled ladies of Europe who are giving up luxury and comfort to nurse the wounded heroes of to-day's battlefield, our minds run back to history's great heroines and with bated breath and straining nerves we review the daring of the maid of Orleans, Joan of Arc, who led an army and saved her country; of the sublime courage of gentle Grace Darling, who, in the teeth of a mighty gale, manned a life-boat and rescued many drowning souls; of Florence Nightingale, the heroine of that other great war, who nursed the sick and wounded soldiers, and of the other women who have done their share towards making history, not knowing, rather not realizing, that within our vision, within our very reach is the greatest heroine of them all—Mother! Plain, little, insignificant mother who wears no armor, no badge of distinction, who has no line to her credit in history, no monument to mark her bravery, yet she has toiled and suffered, sacrificed and endured years and years without number.

Mother a heroine! You can hardly grasp it, can you, boys and girls? Yet, one day mother wore pretty dresses—dresses entirely different from the plain dresses of today. There were ruffles and bows and tucks, and perhaps a rose coquettishly nestled in her hair. But that was long years ago—before Mother became a heroine. Those were sweetheart days when she dreamed of the perpetual love-making, the never-ending lover-like attention of the man—the one man.

But husbands grow indifferent. They forget to admire the glossy hair, the shining eyes, the new gown. The anniversaries, the birthdays slip by, and oh! the pity of it—the forgotten kiss, the clasp of the hand, the touch of affection. Life becomes so void, but our poor heroines become accustomed to the heartache—the dreams fade away, until—ah! a future is before her—a happy realization breaks upon her—the dreams begin again—something to love and to love her is coming—something to fill the aching void.

It is then our heroine shows her mettle; she accepts her martyrdom—her Gethsemane with a smile. She goes down in the Shadow of the Valley, but she rallies and comes back for us, spent, but smiling, and begins the battle of life once more. The slaving over the sewing-machine that her baby shall look pretty is a joy; the toiling over the washtub and ironing-board that her baby shall be sweet and clean is a pleasure; the bending over the hot stove that her baby shall have proper food and nourishment is a privilege. And so it goes on year after year—the monotony, the drudgery all through babyhood, childhood, schooldays and until college time is reached, and then comes an extra task—a greater battle. Her boys and girls must not be stinted in the extras the higher grades demand. You must have your tennis shoes—your gym suits, and your pocket-money for the movies, or the sodas, or the "valentine." Father calls it nonsense—he has long forgotten his romance, but mother never! So mother has to manage for her boys and girls. Did you ever ask how? By cutting down her household expenses, of course, and by sacrificing a new dress or a new hat. Father must not notice the difference in the table fare, so mother bought less and often went without. Do you remember how she used to say she liked the neck of the chicken or the wing? Well, she didn't! She didn't like it any more than you, but she wanted father, or her boys and girls to have the meaty leg or delicious breast. And the pies and cake! You needed a new tie or a hair-ribbon for the school dance, so the pie or cake had to be made smaller, and mother pretended she had grown tired of pastries and went without her share.

And then when diphtheria came and scarlet fever, and father felt he could not afford a nurse, and no one else would come near, who held the cup of cold water to the fever-parched lips? Who rubbed and bathed the poor tired back and fever-tortured skin? Who bent over us day and night and fought away with almost supernatural strength the greatest of enemies—death? Why, mother! My mother—and yours. The heroine who has no line to her credit in history, no monument to mark her bravery, only a day set aside each year for the wearing of a flower, and thank God, you boys and girls, who can wear the red, for only those who must wear the white realize, perhaps, too late, what the word of Mother means. An author once said "Next to God the most beautiful name is mother." It is. Mother!—the magic word—the sweetest in the vocabulary of man.

When you grow up, boys and girls, and attain wealth, honor and distinction take no credit—give it to mother. Whether your calling be art, letters, business or the greatest, and most common in life, parenthood, know that you could not have reached the heights had it not been for mother's patience, labor and sacrifice. In you were born her dreams, her hopes, her ambitions; in you was lost the aching void, the disappointment. I speak of the mothers—the real mothers, who made our men and women of today—not the mothers who preferred the fluffy bundle of a poodle dog to the sweet sacredness of a babe; the mothers who left their God-given gifts to the mercy of maid or governess while they listened to plays of sex and problems and immorality—not those women, boys and girls, but mothers like ours—my mother and yours.

"It's a wonderful thing, a mother;
Other folks can love you, but only your mother understands,
She works for you, looks after you,
Loves you, forgives you anything you may do,
Understands you, and then
The only thing bad she ever does to you
Is to die and leave you."

I AM writing this on March 6th, and the red flames of war are hovering over the shores of the land we are supposed to love, and love it so well that we don't want to do anything to defend it. Not even the threat of bloodshed and national extinction, so far as I can see, can bring our people to their senses. The navy is our first line of defense, in fact our only line, for we have practically no army, and our navy is terribly short of both men and munitions.

In this great crisis when all should be doing their best to make our land secure, first by speeding up construction work on the navy, the men in the Brooklyn Navy yard refused to work overtime. A few miles from my home in Far Rockaway, a huge fort is sadly needed for the defense of New York. An enemy fleet from this point could in a few hours, shell this great city off the map. Instead of welcoming the fort the Rockaway people are protesting that the concussion of the guns will destroy their bric-a-brac and jar the pictures from their walls. They don't want the fort and swear they won't have it. That fort may be the Verdun of America, but the poor benighted idiots can't see it that way. It is the present only for them, for the future they care not.

Out of five hundred boys in a Brooklyn school all but sixty-six refused to learn setting up military exercises. The parents of these boys are foreign born. They want the advantages of citizenship, but will have none of its responsibilities. In spite of what we have suffered in the past from raw levies and "armies" that were mere mobs of half drilled men, the Senate is talking of having half a million young men trained yearly for six months, and this in spite of the fact that the war has proved that a soldier capable of facing poison gas and heavy artillery fire cannot be made in less than a year or a year and a half. To send green troops against seasoned veterans is murder. Such an army would be worse than worthless. Washington protested against this very thing but it was useless. Congress was just as deaf to reason and sense then as it is now.

Congress has made no attempt whatsoever to give this nation an adequate second line of defense, and has actually adjourned without even voting a dollar of the two hundred and seventy millions needed for military protection. We are to rely on the National Guard, which without a year or more of intensive training under regular army officers, under war conditions, would be practically useless and worthless. The Mexican border fiasco proved all over again what has been demonstrated scores of times all through our history, the utter futility of the volunteer system for raising efficient troops.

In the Revoluntionary war the volunteer system nearly lost us our freedom. It was so inefficient that Washington was never able to muster a force larger than one seventieth part of the force enlisted. In 1812 it was even worse. On land at least the war was a disgraceful fiasco, and our Congress was then just as disgracefully and insanely dilatory and foolish as the one we are afflicted with at present. During the latter part of 1813 and for six months of 1814, a British force of 3,000 men and a British fleet lay in Chesapeake Bay, within a few hours of Washington. During that entire time neither Congress nor the President took a single step to put the capital in a state of defense. Not until two days before a clash came was anything done. You know what happened. Just fifteen hundred British troops defeated a much larger force of our raw levies and burned our capitol. In that war we enlisted the enormous number of 395,000 men, but the greatest effective force we ever got together was but 3,000 men. In the war of the Revolution, which nearly broke poor Washington's heart, 527,000 men were enlisted, and yet the largest effective force ever assembled at one time and at one spot was at Saratoga—a beggarly five or six thousand men.

In the second Seminole war, we, a nation of 17,000,000, enlisted 60,000 volunteers to lick 1,200 Indians. General Scott asked for only 3,000 trained troops as the volunteers were practically useless. Congress got mad and fired Scott for his impertinence. This war lingered on for seven years and cost $69,000,000, an enormous sum in those days, and all due to political meddling and incapacity.

Our untrained or half trained citizen soldiery, or militia, have won but two battles in all our history, and they have mutinied thirteen times and deserted and run away eighteen times. The first year of the Civil War our government trusted as usual to volunteers and militia. What was the result? During 1861 we enlisted and paid for 669,000 men, but could only put 28,500 men in the field at Bull Run, and most of them didn't stop running until they'd reached the Potomac twenty-five miles away. In the last years of the war the volunteers who stuck to their jobs were the finest troops in the world, and the American makes the finest soldier on earth if you give him lots of time to train and get fit, but it is doubtful if Congress will ever do that. We shall try and muddle through British fashion, and see our untrained boys, tens of thousands of them offered as a sacrifice on the bloody altars of stupidity, political inefficiency and short-sightedness and probably lose our liberty and country into the bargain. We gamble with fate and learn nothing from the past.

When we mobilized the National Guard recently 47,657 men had to be dropped on account of physical disability; 128,000 went to the border and of these 60,000 had had no military training, 56,813 had never fired a gun, and only 37 out of every hundred when the call came were fit to be mustered into service. We have 152 twelve-inch guns for coast defense without a soul to handle and fire them, and a host of other guns of big caliber without gunners or officers to operate them. The great 16-inch gun for the defense of the Panama Canal lay neglected on the beach for ten long years. Thirteen years after the gun was tested and ready to be sent to Panama, no carriage had been designed or constructed for it.

George Washington said: "If I was called upon to declare upon oath whether the militia had been most serviceable or hurtful, upon the whole I should subscribe to the latter."

These are a few of the facts that they don't put in school histories—unfortunately it is the perusal of these fool histories that makes us such a nation of self-satisfied, complacent idiots when it comes to matters of national defense.

Henry Ford after doing his best to lull the people into a sense of false security by telling them that the only way to be secure was to be helpless, is now rushing to Washington, offering to place his plant and his fortune at the service of the government for national defense. It is always thus. When real danger arrives the dreamers come out of the clouds. If the government has any respect for itself it will tell Mr. Ford to go to the woods until the war is over. There are some actions that cannot be atoned for and the preaching the doctrine of national helplessness is one of these. Another bunch of idiots are talking about a war referendum.

While we were fooling around and casting a vote as to whether or not we would protect our homes, the enemy would be on our shores tearing us to pieces. The idea that no one could invade this country is childish piffle. Our military and naval men know it can be done, and what is more they have seen some of the plans which have been worked out by various foreign powers who are ready to do the job. There is no time for a referendum; we must act and act quickly in self defense if we are to continue a free people.

In the present stage of our development in a national crisis it is far better to have a few expert minds direct the course of the ship of state than to allow millions to butt in who don't know a ship of state from a hole in the ground, and who might and probably would by voting for peace sign this nation's death warrant, and pull the whole structure of our painfully reared civilization down about our ears, with the same delight and abandon that a child demolishes his structure of wooden blocks. There are plenty of splendid men in this country but you would not send them to Congress if you had the chance. Most of the men you send to Congress couldn't run a peanut wagon. However, a few capable men, more by luck than judgment, do get sent to Washington and it is in the hands of these men and our President that we must leave the issues of peace or war. Too many cooks spoil the broth and if the masses of the people butt in they'll spoil not only the broth but the kettle as well. When you run a ship you have one man at the helm and it is the captain who gives orders. He does not ask the passengers in what direction he shall steer, and when the ship is in peril and in danger, he does not take a vote or ask those who have committed their lives to his care what he shall do. His training and experience have fitted him for his work. They have fitted him to meet grave dangers. He may make an error of judgment but he is a thousand times less liable to err than the untrained mob that he has aboard his vessel. Thank God for Washington, thank God for Lincoln, and I hope in the years to come we shall be able to say thank God for Wilson. I thank God for Washington and for Lincoln, not because they kept us out of war, but because they dared to engage us in war when war alone could save us. There are times when a surgeon must apply the knife, when the knife alone can preserve life and stave off inevitable death. If the patient declines an operation and wants to die that is up to him. We cannot however, allow this nation to die through the short-sightedness, the imbecility and stupidity of its individual units. I say stupidity of its units for the vast majority of the American people have got the crazy idea in their heads that if they don't want or wish for a thing they don't have to have it. This crazy notion is due to fifty years of peace and listening to the prattle of fool pacifists and cloud-dwelling dreamers and the Fords and the Bryans, and the folly of relying for protection on our geographical isolation, an isolation which no longer exists, now that we have Mexico plotting on our border, and the Kaiser has gone into the real estate business and has offered New Mexico, Texas and Arizona to Mexico, and has California up his sleeve as a bribe for the Japs to war upon us. If you don't want your country dismembered and hit on three sides at once, you'd better quit fooling and do some hustling. The ballot box is a very wonderful thing but it has its limitations. You can't vote away war, nor wish away disease or death. We are all pretty expert dodgers, but there are some things that cannot, thank God, be dodged, there are some things we must meet like men, and war is one of these things. We owe a duty to ourselves and civilization, and the only worth-while motto for worth-while humanity is and must ever be, not safety first, but duty first, not peace first, but righteousness first. This country would not vote to uphold such a doctrine, because as Admiral Fiske truly says: "The people are not the people they were fifty years ago. They have become flabby, soft, luxury loving, and worst of all, feminized."

That doctrine, duty first however, must be upheld, even if it costs every life this nation has to give. The few able, intelligent and patriotic men in charge of the destinies of this nation realize that fact, and it is they who will decide for us what part we are to play in order that government of, for and by the people shall not perish from the earth, and that governments can only exist by consent of the governed, and that life, liberty, freedom and happiness shall be the common heritage of mankind, and that the peace of the world shall not be disturbed every generation or so by the insane ambitions of sacrilegious fanatical parasites called kings, emperors, kaisers and czars. We must stand shoulder to shoulder in this great world crisis and put ease and softness away from us. Better that we go down to death and destruction, better we be crucified on the cross of righteousness and duty, and sacrifice this nation on the altar of freedom and liberty, than live like worms in the dust, quivering in terror 'neath the heel of bloody military tyrants. Neither tyrants without nor traitors within must swerve us from our course. We are where we are today only because we dared to be strong, dared to be Daniels (no reference here to any weak navy Daniels of the Josephus variety) and stand for what was right. Remember if Ford and Bryan are right, then Lincoln and Washington were wrong. Let every man do his bit as they have done in Europe. Remember this is not a case of going to war, for we have been at war—the whole world has been at war—for nearly three years. When hundreds of Americans are sent to their deaths without warning, men, women and children, that is war no matter what the cowardly pacifists and the copperhead pussyfooters and other feeble-minded lunatics of that type may say. Once again stand together and remember for we must be all Americans now, that those who are not for us are against us.

"Oh! thus be it ever, when freemen shall stand,
Between their loved home and war's desolation;
Blest with victory and peace, may the Heaven-rescued land
Praise the Power that made and preserved us a nation
Then conquer we must, when our cause it is just,
And this be our motto, 'In God is our trust.'
And the star-spangled banner in triumph shall wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her Ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

——, OKLA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

As we have never written to you before, we hope you will print this letter before Billy the Goat gets it. We go to a country school and are in the sixth and eighth grades. Say, Uncle, what is your opinion on education higher than the eighth grade?

We do not like school days as we have such nice times in the summer time, horseback riding, swimming, hunting and rowing. We gather all sorts of wild fruits around here. Our ponies names are Chubby and Kate. We have a camp dinner lots of times.

We are thirteen years of age and we play with dolls and pay no attention to boys.

Your nieces, DOROTHY and ROSALIE.

I thoroughly dislike printing letters of people who do not give their names and addresses, but once in a while one of these letters contains a topic that is so worth while discussing that I just have to break a rule that is laid down by nearly all publications—never to print anonymous letters. Dorothy and Rosalie say they do not like school days. Tens of thousands of children regard education, books and schooling as inventions of the devil. They think these precious things were brought into existence to torture them and mar their childhood. I know this is a fact for as a child I held very similar ideas to Dorothy and Rosalie. There were days when the ringing of that old school bell aroused feelings of fierce resentment in my breast. I did not want to study or work, I wanted to play and dream, and only because, though surrounded by excellent teachers, graduates of great universities, not one ever had the sense to study me and get behind my thoughts and viewpoint and put this whole matter of education up to me in the right light. Instead of wasting half the time I was at school, wasting the money my hard-working father was lavishly spending to give me a chance to make good in the world, I would have improved every minute had someone talked to me as I am now going to talk to these two children, Dorothy and Rosalie. There is work to be done in this world and someone has to do it. You are not going to be allowed to push your share of that work on to some other fellow or some other girl. God expects everyone of us to do our best while we are on this earth, and we can't do our best until the brain, that wonderful organism wherein lies soul, consciousness, character and the germs of everything worth while, has been sown with the seeds of knowledge. If we didn't plow the fields, fertilize the soil, sow the seed, there would be no crops, no harvest. It is just the same with the brain; the soil is there, and though in some heads the soil is better than in others, without education, without careful sowing and fertilizing there can be no worth-while harvest. In Europe by intensified cultivation of the soil they produce twice as much wheat to the acre as we do, and the brain, if it is properly cultivated, will produce a harvest of culture and knowledge several times greater than will the brain that has been merely scratched over or not touched at all. Education to the body is what coal is to the locomotive. It generates the steam which drives the engine. The more steam we put on the bigger the load we can pull, the steeper the grades we can climb, the longer the distance we can go. Now if you waste your youth, waste precious hours in idleness which should be devoted to acquiring knowledge and brain cultivation, you are going to get very little out of life, for we only get out of life what we put into it. We cannot reap unless we sow. We cannot sow the seeds of idleness and reap the fruit of industry. Knowledge and education mean power. They are like the gas in the balloon which enables it to rise to wondrous heights from which we look out upon all the world. The more gas we can put into the balloon the greater our ability to soar and the greater our ability to see, comprehend and grasp. Knowledge gives us the power to grasp, comprehend and visualize things that dull ignorance can never see or imagine. If you do not use your brain you must become the slave, the servant, the hireling of the man who does use his brain. If you overload the stomach you get indigestion, but you never get mental indigestion for the more the brain absorbs the more it cries out for. Now Dorothy and Rosalie you do not know what the future holds for you but it will hold very little, I can tell you that, if you are content to stop at the eighth grade or do not reach even that commonplace goal on the golden highway of knowledge. It does not matter what line of work you take up you will be able to do that work all the better if every cell in your brain is working to full capacity. Ignorance ties us to the earth just as a ball and chain confines a prisoner to one spot. If the prisoner moves he can only do so with great effort. Knowledge severs the chain of ignorance and fills the mind with a golden currency that no robber can steal and no panic or disaster can dissipate. Some day you two girls may fall in love with educated men and then if you are poorly educated you never can be fit companions for these men, and do not be surprised if they soon weary of your society, for not even love can supply a magic ground on which ignorance and knowledge can meet and be perfectly happy. Cultivate your brain, apply yourself to your studies and there is simply no limit to the peaceful worlds you can conquer. Whatever of good there is in the world is the result of knowledge, whatever of evil there is in the world is the result of lack of knowledge. When men who have knowledge and culture sin and do wrong it is not because they haven't the right kind of culture and the proper kind of knowledge. We can hide sin, crime and vice, but no one can hide ignorance. Directly a person opens his mouth, we have his number. On the education of the people of this or any country, the fate of that country depends. Some day, Dorothy and Rosalie, you may aspire to be authors, poets, engineers, architects, lawyers, doctors, preachers, scien-

key hanging on a concealed nail for fear of burglars; and Edith, knowing this, did not once think of attempting to go out that way.

While she sat by the window, trying to think of some way out of her difficulties, her attention was attracted by the peculiar movements of a woman on the opposite side of the street—it was the side street leading through to Beacon.

She was of medium height, richly clad in a long seal garment, but heavily veiled, and she was leading a little child, of two or three years, by the hand.

But for her strange behavior, Edith would have simply thought her to be some young mother, who was giving her little one an airing on that pleasant winter afternoon. She appeared very anxious to shun observation, dropping her head whenever any one passed her, and sometimes turning abruptly around to avoid the gaze of the curious.

She never entirely passed the house but, walked back and forth again and again from the corner to a point opposite the area door near the rear of the dwelling, while she eagerly scanned every window, as if seeking for a glimpse of some one whom she knew. Moreover, from time to time, her eyes appeared to rest curiously upon Edith, whom she could plainly perceive at her post above.

For nearly half an hour she kept this up; then, suddenly crossing the street, disappeared within the area entrance to the house, greatly to the surprise of our fair heroine.

"How very strange!" Edith remarked, in astonishment. "She is certainly too richly clad to be the friend of any of the servants, and if she desires to see Mrs. Goddard, why did she not go to the front entrance and ring?"

While she was pondering the singular incident, she saw the gas-man emerge from the same door, and pass down the street toward another house; then her mind reverted again to her own precarious situation, and she forgot about the intruder and her child below.

The house was very still—there was not even a servant moving about to disturb the almost uncanny silence that reigned throughout it. It was Thursday, and Edith knew that the housemaid and cook's assistant were to have that afternoon out, which, doubtless, accounted in a measure for the unusual quiet.

But this very fact she knew would only serve to make any movement on her part all the more noticeable, and while she was wondering how she should manage her escape before the return of Mrs. Goddard, a slight noise behind her suddenly warned her of the presence of another in the room.

She turned quickly, and a low cry of surprise broke from her as she saw standing, just inside the door, the very woman whom, a few moments before she had seen disappear within the area door of the house.

She was now holding her child in her arms and regarding Edith through her veil with a look of fire and hatred that made the girl's flesh creep with a sense of horror.

Putting the little one down on the floor, she braced herself against the door and remarked, with a bitter sneer, but in a rich, musical voice, and with a foreign accent:

"Without doubt I am in the presence of Madam Correlli."

Edith flushed crimson at her words.

"I—I do not understand you," she faltered, filled with surprise and dismay at being thus addressed by the veiled stranger.

"I wish to see Madam Corelli," the woman remarked in an impatient and bitter tone. "I am sure I am not mistaken addressing you thus."

"Yes, you are mistaken—there is no such person," Edith boldly replied, determined that she would never commit herself by responding to that hated name.

"Are you not the girl whose name was Edith Allen?" demanded her companion, sharply.

"My name is Edith Allen——"

She checked herself suddenly, for she had unwittingly come near uttering the rest of it. She went a step or two nearer the woman, trying to distinguish her features, which were so shadowed by the veil she wore that she could not tell how she looked.

"Ah! so you will admit your identity, but you will not confess to the name by which I have addressed you. Why?" demanded the unknown visitor, with a sneer.

"Because I do not choose," said Edith. "Who are you, and why have you forced yourself upon me thus?"

"And will you also deny this?" cried the stranger, in tones of repressed passion, but ignoring the girl's questions, as she pulled a paper from her pocket and thrust under her eyes a notice of the marriage at Wyoming.

Edith grew pale at the sight of it, when the other, quick to observe it, laughed softly but derisively.

"Ah no; you cannot deny that you were married to Emil Correlli, only the night before last, in the presence of many, many people," she said, in a hoarse, passionate whisper. "Do you think you can deceive me? Do you dare to lie to me?"

"I have no wish to deceive you. I would not knowingly utter a falsehood to any one," Edith gravely returned. "I know, of course, to what you refer; but"—throwing back her head with a defiant air—"I will never answer to the name by which you have called me!"

"Ha! say you so! And why?" eagerly exclaimed her companion regarding her curiously. "Can you deny that you went to the altar with Emil Correlli?" she continued, excitedly. "That a clergyman read the marriage service over you?—that you were afterward introduced to many people as his wife?—and that you are now living under the same roof with him, surrounded by all this luxury"—sweeping her eyes around the room—"for which he has paid?"

"No, I cannot deny it!" said Edith, with a weary sigh. "All that you have read in that paper really happened; but——"

"Aha! Well, but what?" interposed the woman, with a malicious sneer that aroused all Edith's spirit.

"Pardon me," she said, "but I cannot understand what right you, an utter stranger to me, have to intrude upon me thus. Who are you, madam, and why have you forced yourself here to question me in such a dictatorial manner?"

"Ha, ha! ha!" The mirthless laugh was scarcely audible, but it was replete with a bitterness that made Edith shiver with a nameless horror. "Who am I, indeed? Let me assure you that I am one who would never take the stand that you have just taken; who would never refuse to be known as the wife of Emil Correlli, or to be called by his name if I could but have the right to such a position. Look at me!" she commanded tearing the veil from her face. "We have met before."

Edith beheld her, and was amazed, for it needed but a glance to show her that she was the girl who had accosted Emil Correlli on the street that afternoon when he had overtaken and walked home with her after the singular accident and encounter with Mrs. Stewart.

"Aha! and so you know me," the girl went on—for she could not have been a day older than Edith herself, although there were lines of care and suffering upon her brilliant face—seeking the look of recognition in her eyes; "you remember how I confronted him that day when he was walking with you."

"Yes, I remember; but——"

"But that does not tell you who—or what I

The Kingdom of Our Birthright

In running this series we are not advocating belief in astrology or faith in the pretended talismanic charm of birth-stones, although these beliefs have persisted from remote antiquity and have not a few devotees even in this present age of reason. Yet as myths and superstitions that have dominated through the ages they possess historic interest and educational value. Miss June will appear with a pleasing message next month.—EDITOR.

THE sign Gemini (The Twins) influences all persons born between the 20th of May and the 21st of June. Their ideas are expressed through the work of their arms and hands. Artists and skilled mechanics belong to this great realm, and they are likewise successful in educational pursuits along these lines. They inherit a restless tendency and therefore must guard against dissatisfaction and imaginary grievances, else they are likely to abandon what they have long worked for, on the eve of attainment. They are industrious, and if an even tenor of mind can be maintained, their activities will yield profitable returns.

A man born under this sign should marry a woman of strong mind, who will appreciate the husband's ability and give him much encouragement in his purposeful efforts.

Children born under this sign must be well educated, as education develops continuity of thought. The mental and physical training should be well balanced, for they will be vivacious and given to extremes, and nervous disturbances may develop. They require regular periods of rest and should not be permitted to associate with excitable playmates. These natures contain splendid material for the development of useful men and women, if properly handled in childhood.

Women born under this sign are lovers of knowledge and active in its pursuit. They should marry men of cheerful, optimistic temperament, for if mismated their natural state of anxiety will weaken life's forces and destroy its brightness. "Anxiety is the rust of life."

May Birth-stone is the Emerald Symbol of Immortality

"On the imagination God sometimes paints, by dream or symbol, the likeness of things to come."

How shall the great thought of immortality be associated with the daily life, and what suggestion does its symbol, the emerald, carry? To be never satisfied with a day that does not develop in ourselves a strengthened desire for right living, that its influence may be everlasting, seems a fitting answer. Faith in the everlasting, the immortal, and eternal, is the great hope of life; and is it any stranger that we should live forever, than that we live at all? If we look steadfastly at eternity, we find there is something within us that feels, desires and hopes, and which gives moment and weight to all our acts.

There is a beautiful tribute to love and hope in the following, by Keats: "I long to believe in immortality. * * * * If I am destined to be happy with you here—how short is the longest life. I wish to believe in immortality—I wish to live with you forever."

Even though the emerald bears no supernatural charm, well may it exert a benign influence over those who wear it as a birth-stone if it serves as a continual reminder and inspiration to cast aside the frivolities, resist temptation and aspire ever to strengthen in themselves the virtues that make for true happiness in this life and the life everlasting.

How to Make a Queen of the May

Fresh flowers, crepe paper, and a doll are the materials used in making this Queen of the May. In New England, the May-flower or trailing arbutus is in bloom, and very old indeed is the custom there to go in search of May-flowers on the first day of May; in fact, it is the occasion of a holiday in some places, when the schools are closed, and with lunch baskets both teachers and scholars hie them to wood and pasture. It is there that many a Queen of the May is decorated with this sweet-scented trailing flower, and all is youth, laughter and joy.

The lilac is sweetest at night in May, and the primrose, wood violets, and many other spring flowers are in blossom, so it will not be difficult to find fresh decorations.

Shape a waist and skirt of pale green crepe paper, and a pointed girdle of violet color. The hair has a wreath of trailing arbutus around it and the fan-wand is made of paper and flowers interlaced.

The Penalty of Corns

No need now to waste time soaking your feet so often. Nor run the risk of paring.

BLUE-JAY plasters have ended millions of corns. This very night thousands of people will say goodbye to painful corns forever. Touchy corns are needless, even foolish.

Blue-jay brings instant relief. And in 48 hours the average corn is gone. Only a few stubborn ones require a second or third treatment.

A Blue-jay plaster, with its healing wax, is applied in a jiffy. No soreness, no inconvenience. The pain is not temporarily eased, as with paring. There is no danger, as with harsh liquids. Decide to join the happy crowd tonight which has won freedom the Blue-jay way.

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, CIRCULATION, ETC., REQUIRED BY THE ACT OF CONGRESS OF AUGUST 24, 1912, OF COMFORT, PUBLISHED MONTHLY AT AUGUSTA, MAINE, FOR OCTOBER 1, 1916.

State of Maine, ... } ss.
County of Kennebec, ... }

Before me, a Notary Public, in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared William H. Gannett, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the Business Manager of the COMFORT and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management, etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in section 443, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business managers are:
Publisher, W. H. Gannett, Publisher (incorporated), Post-office address, 20 Willow St., Augusta, Maine.
Editor, A. M. Goddard, Post-office address, Augusta, Maine.
Managing Editor, William H. Gannett, Post-office address, Augusta, Maine.
Business Managers, W. H. Gannett, Bus. Mgr., Guy P. Gannett, Assist. Bus. Mgr., Post-office address, Augusta, Maine.

2. That the owners are: (Give names and addresses of individual owners, or if a corporation, give its name and the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of the total amount of stock.) Owner: W. H. Gannett, Publisher (Incorporated), 20 Willow St., Augusta, Maine.—Stockholders:—W. H. Gannett, Augusta, Maine; Sadie H. Gannett, Augusta, Maine; Guy P. Gannett, Augusta, Maine.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.) No outstanding bonds, mortgages or other securities.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona-fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

WILLIAM H. GANNETT, Bus. Mgr.

Your Individual Perfume

A WOMAN sat down by me, the other day, in a crowded car, so heavily perfumed that I was finally obliged to change my seat. Isn't it funny, girls, that some people seem to think that because a rose smells sweet in a garden, all they have to do to be pleasing to other people is to sprinkle their clothes with the concentrated essence of hundreds of roses.

This is all wrong! Do you know—but of course you do—that any suggestion of heavy perfume is considered very ill-bred indeed? It suggests an attempt to conceal objectionable odors, and of course the dainty woman is as fresh and sweet at all times as a daily bath, or better still a morning and evening bath, can make her.

You must be careful that the body never carries with it an odor. In summer-time, the armpits should receive constant attention. Scrub them with a brush and hot soapy water when you take your body bath night and morning, and don't neglect to give them additional attention with washcloth and borax water several other times a day.

If the feet are subject to perspiration, they also need special care and fresh hose at least a couple of times a day. It's not much trouble to rinse out a pair of stockings if your supply runs short.

But let's stop talking about objectionable odors, and see how we can utilize the sweet fragrant ones that come in bottles and jars from our druggists and department stores.

First, you should choose some one particular perfume for your very own. If you are a young girl, very, very delicate odors should be chosen—scents which suggest springtime—violet, apple blossom, cherry blossom, etc. If an older woman, select odors like rose or mignonette. Very heavy perfumes, like tuberose, lily of the valley, heliotrope, should rarely be chosen as one's favorite perfume, although a touch of any may be added to some other more delicate perfume to produce an individual blend, as it is called.

Use your perfume in the form of sachet powder to fill flat sachets lining your dresser drawers, small sachets to scatter among your folded lingerie, and to tie to the dress hangers in your closet. Liquid perfume should be gotten in the heavy essences—and used just one tiny drop put behind each ear. Choose a face powder which has the same fragrance as your sachet powder and perfume.

Toilet water can be used in an atomizer and sprayed on the hands after bathing. Do not perfume the body, except by dusting with a perfumed talcum, the fragrance of which soon passes away except as the merest faint suggestion.

Do not use liquid perfume on your handkerchiefs, but keep them in a box lined with sachet pads.

In this way, you will suggest a very, very faint fragrance when you enter a room, yet one will scarcely connect it with perfume. You will seem always dainty, sweet, natural, while the use of much perfume suggests coarseness, materiallty, and a lack of fine delicacy.

Will you remember, girls?

Answers to Questions

C. H.—Practise the two exercises given to "Blanche" in last month's COMFORT. Vigorous exercise with the arms will help to reduce the bust always. If you would play tennis or row or swim, your bust would show the difference in a very short time. Perspiration breaks down the tissues and wears them away, so if you will cut a piece of single-faced rubber sheeting wide enough to amply cover the bust and long enough to wrap around the body, and bind it firmly over bust, carrying it around the back, and fastening firmly in place with strips of adhesive plaster which you can buy at the drug-store in little rolls an inch wide, your bust will soon be somewhat reduced by the perspiration induced. You will have to wear the sheeting constantly for a time, bound very firmly to you.

Miss A. B.—I presume you mean a formula for making the hair fluffy. If you will add a piece of washing soda about the size of your thumbnail to the soap and water in which you shampoo your hair once in three weeks, it will help to make the hair fluffy. Your soap and water should consist of a small cake of Castile soap shaved into a quart of boiling water and dissolved over the fire.

A COMFORT Lover.—No, my dear, there is no way to make your feet shorter, but as you are only thirteen years old you have a long way to grow up yet, and your feet will not be too large for the rest of your body when you are older. Lots of people wear a No. 6 shoe—I do, myself, if that is any comfort to you, and really my feet are quite good to look at! Keep your shoes well taken care of, cleaned and polished or whitened, as the case may be, and wear trim, neatly fitting hose, see that your heels are not run over and that your shoes button or lace trimly about the ankle, and you will realize, before long, that you have a very good foot indeed.

Peggy.—You no doubt saw the formula for the salicylic acid treatment for moles in the last issue of COMFORT. Your letter came after that was ready to print. I'm always glad to answer questions from my readers.

May G.—Do not use carbolic acid on your facial skin! A good face bleach is made by mixing the white of one egg (unbeaten) with one ounce of strained honey and fifteen drops of tincture of benzoin. To this add enough ground barley to make a paste you can spread. At night smear the face thickly with this and tie over it a thin cheese-cloth mask with holes for eyes, nose and mouth. In the morning, wash the face in warm, soapy water and be sure to get every particle of the paste off. Take this several nights, and you will note a great improvement in your skin. Form the practise, also, of drinking the juice of a lemon or half a lemon in a glass of cool water each morning before breakfast. This is good to keep the skin clear. As to your other question, see the exercises given "Peg" in the last issue of COMFORT.

Mrs. E. T.—Don't put any tonics on your little girl's scalp. A child's scalp is very sensitive. What she needs is attention to her general health. Perhaps she is thin for her age. Feed her plenty of potatoes, rice, bread, butter, milk and cream, and green vegetables and fruits. Very little meat, but soft cooked eggs. Send her to bed by eight o'clock every night, and let her sleep till seven. Encourage her to run and romp and do everything outdoors that is healthful exercise. Have plenty of fresh air in her sleeping-room. Have her take a complete body bath every day, either morning or evening or both. Watch her bowels. See that she forms the habit of going at a regular time each day. Usually about fifteen or twenty minutes after breakfast is a good time. Never let her forget this. Have her go again at night before retiring. See that she drinks six or seven glasses of water a day. Massage her scalp gently at night. Possibly doing her hair up at night is causing it to break and come out, although you use rags. There is more or less strain on the hair, under any circumstances, when done up, and if I were she I would rather go without curls than run the risk of losing my hair. A curling fluid that is harmless is as follows:

Curling Fluid

Quince seeds, one and one half drams; cologne water, one half ounce; hot water, one half pint; oil of cloves, six drops; oil of lavender, six drops.

Soak the quince seeds in the water for several hours. Strain, and you will have a thick liquid like mucilage. Add to this the cologne to which the cloves and lavender have already been added. Moisten the hair with this before putting up on curlers. Moisten only slightly, of course. For yourself, if your hair is dry I should not use anything on my scalp containing either bay rum or alcohol. Both are drying. Instead, massage your scalp, and rub in a little olive oil occasionally—not on the hair but just on the scalp, using the tips of the fingers. Look to your general health—that, I feel sure, is where the trouble lies. You can't have healthy hair if stomach, bowels, or liver are out of order, or if you are below par in weight or strength.

Marjorie.—See answer to "Peggy."

Mrs. G. B.—See answer to "May G."—the last part. You do not tell me your height, so I do not know how much you should weigh. You are probably pretty active, since you do so many things, and that keeps you from gaining. You should be careful to eat fattening foods. I wish you would read the advice given to "A. P. R." in the last issue of COMFORT. You should model your diet on those directions, and especially drink quantities of water, but not at meals. You get enough exercise now, and probably your muscles are fairly well developed, so I would hardly advise further exercise for you with this end in view. What you need is to add fat to the body and this can be done only through food. A little girl of eleven seldom should be given artificial exercises. They are for adults who do not get enough active exercise, or who cannot play in the open air as every child should. Playing hop-scotch or any hopping game will develop your little girl's legs. Playing ball—hand-ball—tennis, rowing, swimming, will develop her arms. Romping of any kind will tend to develop her chest because it will make her breathe deeply, and this is the only way in which the chest is developed—just by taking in deep breaths. Encourage her, therefore, to indulge in every kind of active outdoor sport, and don't let her stay indoors except when the weather makes it impossible for her to be out. If you will do this, and look after her diet, her bowels, and see that she drinks plenty of water, you will have a perfectly healthy little daughter, and one whose body will become rounded and properly proportioned as she arrives at the age of adolescence.

A Subscriber.—The matter with your dry, "crinkly" skin is the use of too much soap. Stop using it more than once a day, and then only at night. Do not rub soap on the face, but make a mild soapsuds with warm water and Castile soap and use a complexion brush with which to scrub the face at night. Rinse innumerable times, finally in cold water. The reason your pores are so large is that you have probably used hot water too often and failed to close the pores afterward. Do not use any soap in the daytime at all, and no hot water—only tepid water. Rub a little cold cream into the skin and keep on rubbing until the skin will absorb no more. Then wipe with absorbent cotton. Do this once a day for a little time, and always rub in a very little cold cream over the entire surface of the face (wiping gently with a bit of absorbent cotton, afterward) before applying powder. Otherwise powder will dry an already dry skin. Friction your face with your hands each time after washing and before dashing cold water on the skin. This will help to close those large pores.

L. E. M.—I do not know what is the cause of the pimples at the edge of your hair. Do you shampoo once in three weeks, and is your scalp healthy? Pimples such as you mention sometimes come when one has accidentally acquired parasites in the hair, but I hope you have not been so unlucky. A friend of mine once had this happen to her and did not know what was the matter. When she found out, she used one dram of pulverized larkspur seed in a pint of boiling water and washed the hair with this at night, shampooing it thoroughly the next morning.

MAKE YOURSELF SMALL SACHET PADS TO LAY IN YOUR DRESSER DRAWERS.

One or two applications cured the condition acquired on the street cars or some other place of that kind. I imagine your trouble may be one of the blood, though, and you should watch what you eat. Fruits and vegetables will help out immensely, as well as drinking plenty of water. Vaseline slightly melted and applied to the edges of the lashes or to the eyebrows are said to make them grow, but warm olive or sesame oil are probably better for the brows. Apply with a small clean mucilage brush, nightly, being careful always to get none of the liquid in the eyes. For the salicylic formula, see answer to "Peggy."

Miss L. K.—None of the formulas for my face creams contain peroxide. Tell me why you want a "peroxide cream" and I will suggest something for you to use. If you want it for a bleach, read what I said to "May G."

Mrs. W. O. L.—The only thing you can do to remove the hair growing low in the back of your neck is to use a depilatory, and this means that it will surely come back before long and somewhat heavier. Of course electrolysis would remove it, but you need to be near a large city to take it, and to remove a growth extending thickly below the nape of the neck would be very expensive. If you care to use a depilatory, here is one.

Depilatory

Sulphate of barium, one ounce; water, four ounces. Pour this liquid on corn-starch to make a thin paste. Spread on the hairy spot and let stay on until it begins to feel warm, when scrape off with the blunt edge of a silver knife—the back of the knife. The hairs will come with the dried paste.

Mrs. M. L.—The amount of milk to be taken a day on the milk diet is two glasses of milk every two hours—six quarts of milk a day. When you start the diet, you can take a glass and a half every hour from, say, seven-thirty A. M. until about 3.30 P. M. And then you can eat a light supper at six-thirty. When you are taking the full milk diet you do not eat any solid food at all. Use cold milk—but not ice-cold. If your hair is short and thin and "dead," you should never use anything to make it "fluffy," for such things always dry the hair. See the last part of my answer to "Mrs. F. T." this month, and my answer to "Mrs. H. S. A." in last month's COMFORT. These are the directions for you to follow. Be especially careful to massage the scalp every night.

Troubled.—For ingrowing toenails, the first thing to do is to change the style of shoe. It is either too narrow or presses down too closely on the toes. Perhaps your shoe is a little too short as well as too narrow. One way of curing an ingrowing nail is to file it down thin along its center and also make a V-shaped cut in the middle of the edge of the nail, with the point of the V toward the foot, the two ends of the V being at the opposite sides of the nail edge. The dead pieces of cuticle which have accumulated under the edges must be removed with the pointed end of an orange-wood stick. Then the nail gently raised and a little absorbent cotton dipped in listerine used to wash the spot. It is not a bad idea to pour peroxide over the flesh which has been cut into by the nail. Rub a little zinc ointment, afterward, on the inflamed spot. Do this daily. If you can stand it, it is a good idea to cut a very thin little sliver of cork and insert it under the edge of the nail. You should dip the cork in water to which two drops of carbolic acid to the ounce have been added. The cork will swell a little after inserting under the nail and therefore keep it raised. Repeat every second day. The main thing with ingrowing nails is to keep everlastingly at them. If yours have not yet badly wounded the flesh, all that may be necessary is to use a nail file, file the center of the nail thin, cut the edge square instead of rounding, and use your orange-wood stick to cleanse away the bits of cuticle, washing the toe very carefully and rubbing in a little zinc ointment. But, remember, your shoes are in some manner to blame!

Mrs. M. H.—You are a little over weight, and both bust and hips are somewhat too large. What you need to do is to reduce a little. Exercise will not help your arms, because they are already exercised amply through all the active work you do. When you reduce all over, your arms will lose also. Cut out fat-building foods for a time, at least to some degree. Don't eat potatoes or drink milk or take cream on anything you eat, and use only a very little butter. Eat lean meats, fruits and vegetables. Take a hot bath every night, just as hot as you can stand it, and roll yourself up in a woolen blanket, letting yourself perspire for half an hour. Nothing breaks down extra fat like perspiration. Eat just a little less than you have been accustomed to doing. You can, if you have the time and opportunity, induce perspiration of the arms alone by wrapping them in strips of rubber sheeting, very firmly, and holding the sheeting in place with bits of adhesive tape which you can buy at your drug-store. This will make the arms hot and cause them to perspire, and every ounce of perspiration means a loss in flesh.

Flora D.—No, cocoa-butter is not injurious to the body skin, but should not be used on the face. Its chief value for the bust lies in the fact that it is gently massaged in with a circular motion, and that this gentle massage is good for the development of the bosom. However, you cannot expect to gain in bust measurement while your whole body is under weight. What you must do is to build up your health and weight. You should weigh one hundred and thirty-five to one hundred and forty pounds, and you say your weight is only one hundred and six. Read the directions to "A. P. R." in the last issue of COMFORT with directions for the things to do to gain in weight. One big thing you must remember is that your bowels must move every day of your life, freely. Do not rely on cathartics, but drink eight to ten glasses of water daily, and if they do not move naturally put half-a-dozen prunes to soak at night in a tumbler of water, then eat the prunes, masticating thoroughly, the first thing in the morning, and drink the prune juice. Eat fruits and green vegetables, and drink milk and eat cream on your foods, and potatoes and rice and other fat-building foods. Try to get eight to ten hours' sleep every night. If you can't, but can manage to get an hour's nap in the daytime, be sure to take that. To gain, you must get as much rest as possible, as much fresh air, as much fat-building food, and some exercise. When you have gained the twenty-five or more pounds you need, you will find your bust has filled out again. Twenty-five pounds seems a lot to gain, but you can really gain it if you will go at it systematically. Be sure to read the directions given to "A. P. R."

tists, actresses and you may have a natural aptitude for one or other of these professions, and you may achieve greatness in one or other of them, if you do not waste your time and opportunity for learning while at school. Some people in later years can make up for the wasted opportunities of youth, but very few can. It is best to cultivate the mind when the soil is receptive and that is in the days of youth. Education is the apprenticeship of life. Horace Mann said: "Schoolhouses are the republican line of fortifications." Theodore Parker said that nearly everyone in this country got a mouthful of education, but scarcely anyone got a full meal. When this nation gets a full meal for the brain as it does for the stomach, and it's going to get that full meal within a couple of generations, heaven on earth will be close at hand. Apply yourselves to your studies, Dorothy and Rosalie. The schoolhouse is the foundation of all greatness, especially if it has a Sunday school annex. More of that some other time. Now don't waste a second while you are at school. If you do you will be only handicapping yourselves in the race of life and you'll be fettering yourselves to a ball and chain, dumb slaves to that most merciless of all tyrannies, the tyranny of ignorance.

BUTLER, R. R. 4, KY.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a little girl on a high hill in Kentucky. I live with my grandma and she has cows. I help milk and sometimes milk all four of the cows. We have the prettiest little Holstein calf you ever saw and we named him Woodie for President Wilson. I have a beautiful white and black rabbit and I call him Jack. I have a little duck and its name is Tidles and when it gets to laying maybe I can send you some eggs. I am going to set out a strawberry patch, perhaps I can send you some strawberries this summer or fall, and I am going to send you some flowers that won't wilt. I am small but I can do most all kinds of work. I go to school every day and I read COMFORT at night. My grandma can't do without COMFORT. We have several of your books and my grandma thinks Uncle Charlie is the best man in the world. She often looks through your picture book and admires all of your pictures very much, especially the ones when you were thirty-two and twenty-two.

Your niece,
RUTH ABBOTT.

Thank you, Ruth, for your chatty little letter. I am delighted to find that grandma is such a good friend of mine, and I am more than happy to know that she is the proud possessor of four cows. The only thing that grandmas ever seem to possess as far as I can discover, is rheumatism. Nearly every letter I receive from you young people, contains a sentence which runs like this: "Grandpa has cows and grandma has rheumatism." Thank heaven Ruth that your grandma stands in a class by herself. I love grandmas, and when I look at their wrinkled brows, faded eyes and above all at their poor, tired, withered hands, a big lump comes in my throat. Ah, me! What a debt the world owes to its grandmas, and what myriad tasks those withered hands have performed—hard and thankless tasks, tasks which grandma did not hesitate to do and took a pleasure in doing. I hope you appreciate grandma, Ruth, and the older grandma gets the more considerate, kind, thoughtful and helpful you will be to her I trust. You may be a grandma yourself some day and will be yearning for love and sympathy just as she is, so milk the cows and if Woodie Wilson gets entangled in a barbed wire fence, mind you supply him with a typewriter and lots of paper so he can write notes to the fence and tell it not to be so offensive. It is a good thing you did not name the calf Bill Bryan, or you would have had to amputate its tail and extract its horns, for Bill as you doubtless remember does not believe in preparedness. You can imagine what a dandy time a cow would have in flytime with no tail. Bill would like to give us a hornless and tailless United States, so that the dogs of war could bite our heads off in front, and the militaristic flies and hornets of the old world sting the life out of us behind. Nature knew what kind of a world a cow was going into and gave it weapons of offense and defense. Well Herr Wilhelm Bryan shuts his eyes to the kind of world we are in, and some idiots mistake his inane babble and infantile vaporings for genius. Well as Barnum said "there is one born every minute." If you don't know what kind of a "one" I mean Ruth, ask grandma, she's wise and she knows. Barnum got a lot of money out of the "ones" and the peace at any pricers must find their field a profitable one, or they would not be working it so hard. Am delighted to know Ruth, that grandma admires the pictures which were taken of me in my youth. Maybe if Grandma and I could both go back about thirty years, there might be a very pretty romance woven round that hill in Kentucky, especially if grandma could keep a tight hold on the four cows. With meat and milk at their present high prices and famine stalking the earth I trust Ruth, that you will forgive me for mixing romance and business. A million kisses to you Ruth, and see that grandma gets her share if she will accept them. If these tokens of my affection are not acceptable please pass them on to Woodie Wilson; they may help to soothe him when the flies and hyphenates get too bothersome.

AMBOY, ILL.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE AND COUSINS:

I am a little girl twelve years of age. Mamma, my sister Bernice and brother, Theodore, my cousin Irving Raymond and I spent the year of 1914 in touring Europe. We were in Paris, when the war started. We sailed for America on the first ship and arrived in New York all safe and sound. The ship was terribly crowded with people and their belongings.

We visited the principal cities in Belgium, Austria, Hungary, France, Germany and the British Isles. Paris and Vienna I thought were the nicest and prettiest cities. We got awfully tired of riding on those slow trains over there. I often wished we had our motor cars. Mamma has two motors, my brother has one and my sister and I have one.

We are only visiting in Amboy, at mamma's sister's place. It is a very beautiful place here in the country, situated on a high hill overlooking the river. My real home is in Peoria, Ill. We expect to go home the first of May and the first of June we are going to our summer home "Bluemont" in Michigan. I have been in California three times, in Canada twice and in Mexico once, I have been in Florida several times.

Unlike most of the cousins, I don't know how to do anything in the "work line." When at home I devote my time to music and school studies and tennis and golf. I don't even know how to dress myself or comb my hair. My maid, Lila, does that for me.

Do you like music, Uncle? I have taken ninety-six

DELATONE

REMOVES HAIR FROM FACE, NECK OR ARMS

DELATONE is an old and well-known scientific preparation, in powder form, for the quick, safe and certain removal of hairy growths—no matter how thick or stubborn they may be. You make a paste by mixing a little Delatone and water; then spread on the hairy surface. After two or three minutes, rub off the paste and the hairs are gone. When the skin is washed, it will be found clean, firm and hairless—as smooth as a baby's. Delatone is recommended by beauty authorities and experts.

A Family Stratagem

By W. W. Hatfield

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

DR. PHILIP BENDER sat in the waiting-room of his office in anticipation of a visit from his son. He was not in a genial frame of mind. The son, who had just attained his majority, had incurred the parental displeasure by eloping with a young lady whose livelihood had been earned upon the stage, a vocation odious beyond comparison to Dr. Bender.

Harry Bender, the son, was a bank clerk. His father knew that the withdrawal of his influence would be sufficient to cause the loss of Harry's position which would render the latter practically destitute. As a last resort, if the young man would not listen to reason, Dr. Bender had decided to pursue this course, in the hope that it might force him to sever his alliance with this "show girl." While Mrs. Bender was inclined to be opposed to such drastic action, she realized the futility of attempting to sway her husband, once he had decided upon a policy.

The doctor was still impatiently awaiting Harry's arrival and growing more and more exasperated with each moment of delay, when the door opened and a young lady entered. As it was not during his office hours, this interruption did not tend to placate him. The habit of professional politeness, however, prevented him from betraying his annoyance to a patient. Habitually also, he attempted a diagnosis of the prospective case, which failed, as the young lady was the picture of ruddy, youthful health. This appearance was aptly set off by her quiet but becoming costume.

"Good morning," she began, "you are the doctor, I presume."

"Quite correct," he answered, noting subconsciously that her teeth were pearly white and her smile bewitching.

"Permit me to introduce myself," continued his visitor, proffering a card.

The doctor glanced at the slip of cardboard. It read:

Miss Amy Carlton
Impersonatrix
With the Blum Theatrical Co.

"I came here," Miss Carlton went on, "in the interest of your son and his bride. I have been acquainted with the young Mr. Bender for some time, and have been associated with the young lady whom he has just married during her entire theatrical career. I assure you that you will be doing both yourself and them a very great injustice if you refuse to recognize their union."

Dr. Bender stifled a word which he had never heard in Sunday school.

"Miss Carlton," he announced stiffly, "I do not care to hear anything more on this subject. My mind is made up—conclusively. I will not sanction my son's marriage to a stage girl." He had contrived to put an immeasurable contempt into the words: "stage girl." "I bid you a good day."

"One moment, doctor," the girl interrupted. "I am myself, as you put it, a 'stage girl.' Do I appear to you as the kind of a person who is entirely destitute of human qualities, or of feelings?"

Miss Carlton had flushed hotly. It was evident that she had felt keenly the thinly veiled insult in the man's words. Dr. Bender, whose greatest pride was his reputation for courtesy to the gentler sex, was quick to note the effect of his disparagement, and felt a consuming desire to be able to retract the statement. Moreover, a single glance at the innocent, girlish figure before him made him realize that he had been unjust as well as ungentlemanly.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Carlton," he entreated "I had no intention of including you in my classification, much less of affronting you. But I assure you that your good offices are futile. I can never reconcile myself to my son's alliance with one of your profession, not even were that person as winning and as evidently ladylike as yourself."

"I accept your apology, Dr. Bender, although your prejudice is in itself an indignity. You seem to think of us as a class of people not entitled to the emotions of ordinary humans, a race apart, despised. I wonder if you remember, doctor, when you were young. Did it make any difference to you if the future Mrs. Bender happened to be poor, if she had to work for her living? Did you care whether she sewed, or sang, or played a piano to keep body and soul together, as long as she was good and pure? Did your love balk at conventions? Was it her work you loved, doctor, or was it the girl?"

Dr. Bender did not answer. Miss Carlton had taken him by the hand, was looking up into his eyes, but he did not seem to be aware of it. For her words had taken him back over twenty-five long years, back to the time when he had been a young medical student, and his sweetheart, the Mrs. Bender of today, had been a cashier in a restaurant. And, with consummate skill, she kept him there. She talked to him of moonlight strolls, of nights in the park. She made him live over again the love scenes of his young manhood. So cleverly did she weave about him a fabric of tender recollections that he lost cognizance of his surroundings, the office, his visitor. Miss Carlton put her hands on his shoulders, and talked on. Her arms slipped about his neck. Utterly lost in the enchantment which the girl's art had cast upon him, living, breathing a love dream of yore, he put his arm around her and drew her to him, the while her golden head dropped upon his shoulder.

At this juncture he was rudely brought back to reality by the opening of a door. Mrs. Bender, struck dumb and motionless with astonishment, stood upon the threshold. Miss Carlton sprang away, blushing. The doctor, shamefaced and red, tried to stammer out an explanation. But before he could unburden himself of anything intelligible, his wife, in high dudgeon, had withdrawn, slamming the door behind her.

The two culprits faced each other in silence. Miss Carlton dropped her gaze to the floor, her face a flaming scarlet. From a distant room came the sound of hysterical sobbing. Dr. Bender fell to pacing the floor with long, nervous strides. Twenty-five years of wedded happiness, and now to have his connubial bliss shattered by this totally unexplainable affair!

Several minutes of exquisite torture had passed, when the door again opened and Harry Bender entered.

"Well, dad," he grinned, "looks like you've got yourself in a pickle. If you'll listen to reason, though, I think I can square you."

"How?" gasped his father, like a drowning man clutching at the proverbial straw.

"Not so fast, dad," chuckled Harry. "Business first. Do you promise to bestow the paternal blessing on Mrs. Bender, junior, and yours truly?"

"Yes, yes. With all my heart," answered the doctor.

"That's the spirit," the young man returned, and opening the door called: "Mother!"

His mother, still red-eyed and indignant, apparently, appeared in the door.

"Mother," Harry repeated, taking her by the hand and leading her over to the blushing Miss Carlton, "I wish to introduce to you your daughter-in-law, formerly Miss Amy Carlton. She has given up a promising theatrical career for a kitchen apron. Father likes his new daughter immensely."

"And so do I," avowed Mrs. Bender, senior, heartily, as she threw her arms around the girl's neck.

Then there was a belated wedding celebration in which all parties concerned felt the greatest satisfaction, albeit for varying reasons. It was some time, however, before they felt safe in telling the doctor that the whole affair was a frame-up, to which even the senior Mrs. Bender had been a party.

she began to cry out loud?

"I am so glad you like him. I couldn't marry any one you did not like," unconsciously turning the screw tighter. "Tell me, what do you think about Lady Satterlee?"

"Does she know?"

"Yes," hesitatingly. "She was very sweet, but I thought she was surprised at first."

"Did she say so?" This question was uttered with a perceptible huskiness of tone. Was every one going to be surprised? Had every one seen her idiotic infatuation written on her face?

"Oh, no," thoughtfully. "She kissed me, and was very nice, but I fancied it was somehow a shock to her. Perhaps"—laughing—"she was like Maurice and thought it was you he liked!"

"Maurice is a fool!" Oh! if Agatha would only go! How long must she bear this? She twisted restlessly in her narrow bed. "You never thought anything so silly, Agatha?" she added, in a low, hard voice.

"I? Oh, no. You see," blushing in the darkness, quite uselessly, "I knew for ages that he used to go to St. Jude's to see me—but don't you tell Lady Satterlee."

"It would not shock her." How little Agatha knew about Satterlee's mother!

"Who is going to tell Mr. Mayne about it all? that is more to the point."

"Lord Satterlee. Tell me do you think Mr. Mayne will forbid the banns?"

"He can't. He has nothing to say about our getting married. He may be hateful, but that won't matter to you."

"Nerine, what's the matter? You are shivering so that the bed shakes."

"I'm cold," and her chattering teeth corroborated her utterance. "The prospect of living here with Mr Mayne when you're gone is—not cheering."

"I'm not gone yet, my dear. Wait; I'll put something more over you. I'm cold myself, now that I think of it."

"Do go," Nerine advised as Agatha put a shawl over the bed. "You will catch cold, and you must look nice in the morning. Good night," presenting a frozen cheek to be kissed. "I—I am so glad, Agatha," incoherently.

"I thought you would be. But, oh! my dear, don't talk of being left with Mr. Mayne. I am not going yet, and you are coming to me when I do."

What! live in Satterlee's house, after she had so nearly betrayed herself to him? Never! She set her teeth to prevent her saying it aloud as Agatha tucked her up carefully.

"Think how nice that would be!" yawning. "Oh! I am so tired, Nerine! But it was a heavenly ball—quite worth the dresses. By the way, where do you suppose Mr. Mayne thought you obtained the gown which awed him so?"

"I don't care what he thought. Do go, Agatha. I am so tired!" with a choking sob which the other did not hear.

"Yes, I am going. Good night," and Agatha picked her way once more through the furniture to her own room, where she said her prayers, tumbled into bed, and was asleep in no time.

Nerine pushed angrily at her pillow as she heard the soft, regular breaths from the other room. She could sleep, too, if it were not for the horrid waltz from "Faust" which kept playing itself in her head.

She was tired enough—tired to the bone.

Mr. Mayne was right—balls were dust and ashes, and she had been a fool to go. And she had been a belle, too. How must girls feel who had been wall flowers all the evening? And she had for her pains a white satin frock (not paid for and dirty round the hem), a pair of aching feet, and a heart sick and sore; while Agatha——

She sat bolt upright in the chilly night to think how she would feel if she stood in Agatha's shoes and Agatha in hers.

"Oh, I'm glad, Agatha has not to feel like this!" and tears flowed from her hot eyes. "It would have half killed Agatha, and it has only a quarter killed me," smiling ruefully, but not for long, for loud sobs were choking her, and she hid her head lest Agatha might hear them.

It was best as it was, and yet——

"Oh, my love, I could have loved you better than Agatha!" broke from her in a bitter, whispered cry. "Oh, my dear, if you had only loved me!"

She lay staring into the darkness, seeing again the little room which had so nearly been witness of that most bitter humiliation—a girl giving herself to a man who does not want her.

As she looked back upon the events of the evening, her heart grew hard. She had been mad of late; tomorrow she must rise sane, and go her way as other women had done before her. But there was one thing certain—she would keep clear forever of love and lovers, and she would never, never go to another ball.

She fell asleep at last, as the winter dawn began to break, and she slept heavily until after noon; while Agatha, coming in on tiptoe with a useless breakfast marveled at Nerine's red and swollen eyelids and the paleness of her tired face.

CHAPTER XIV.

"I DON'T WONDER THEY HATE HIM."

There was no doubt about it.

Mr. Mayne had had a trying day. He sat in his own sacred retreat toward five o'clock in the afternoon and felt mentally and physically shattered.

To begin with, he had been disturbed during the hour of repose, which he invariably took after lunch, by a message that Lord and Lady Satterlee were in the drawing-room, waiting to see him. What they wanted of him, he had no idea. He knew of the Satterlees merely as magnates of another county who had taken up his objectionable stepson, and had induced his stepdaughters to go to a ball in their charge.

It was with all his dignity and his very best manner that he entered the great drawing-room to receive them, but it was with great difficulty that he retained either manner or dignity in their company.

Their advent had evidently been known to every one in the house but himself, for a huge fire burned in the wide grate. Things had come to a pretty pass indeed when a fire was lighted in the drawing-room without Mr. Mayne's orders, or efforts were made to do honor to any guests but his. He would settle with Agatha for this by and by!

But when the interview was over he had lost all inclination to settle with Agatha, so astounding was the communication made by Lord Satterlee, so placidly was his consent to all her plans taken for granted by Lady Satterlee, the only person Mr. Mayne had ever encountered who was more than his match.

There was nothing to be made by opposing Agatha's engagement; Mr. Mayne saw that at a glance. It was doubtful if much could be made by assenting politely to it; but the Satterlees were people too big to offend; he had only ten months left to rule at Lispenard House, and he would not care to have his past reign scrutinized very closely by a hostile and powerful son-in-law. He was furious at the freedom taken by his stepdaughters during his absence, which had resulted in this wonderful change; but what was done was done, and could not be mended. He was icily polite to the Satterlees, mother and son, and with courtly insincerity thanked Lady Satterlee for having been so kind to his stepdaughters during his absence, to which her ladyship made no reply.

There was a short but deadly pause, and then Lady Satterlee rose.

"I think, Mr. Mayne, since we have settled all our business," she said, with her slow smile, "that Satterlee and I will go and find Agatha—and Nerine."

Mr. Mayne, for once in his life, felt himself dismissed.

"If you will allow me, I will send them to you."

He rang the bell, and Lady Satterlee waited to see for what purpose. If he intended to send for the girls and remain himself, he must be crushed at once.

But Mr. Mayne was too clever to resort to the petty pleasure of remaining where he was not wanted; he rang the bell simply to show that his were still the reins of government.

"Tea, Jane, if you please," was all he said when that neat domestic appeared. "And tell the young ladies—— No, stay! I will tell them myself," with a nod of dismissal. "You will excuse me," he said, turning to Lady Satterlee as the door closed after Jane. "I will send my stepdaughters to you myself." And he took his leave with that fine manner he had acquired, heaven knew where.

"Little horror!" said Lady Satterlee, when he was gone. "I don't wonder they hate him! Did you see how his eyes glittered when he thanked me for chaperoning those poor children? He would have liked to inquire how I dared do anything so officious!"

She walked to the window and gazed into the garden.

"How long those girls are! Has that wretched little man not told them I am waiting?" and she glanced impatiently at her watch.

As she did so, Agatha entered, looking as shy as was possible to so tall and handsome a person, and Lady Satterlee walked over to meet her, with kindly outstretched hands.

"I must kiss my new daughter," she said, very prettily. "I could not do it last night, could I?" But it was the vaguest little shadow of disappointment which made her voice so tender. With how much more heart would she have kissed Nerine!

"Where is your sister?" she asked presently. "I want her to cheer me. You see, I had looked forward to a battle with your stepfather, and we had the tamest, flattest of interviews. I felt quite defrauded of a joyful victory."

Agatha blushed a little.

"Nerine is in the morning-room; I think she is coming presently."

How could she tell the unvarnished truth—that Nerine had refused to accompany her?

"I will go and see her." Lady Satterlee spoke quite briskly, joyful at the chance of escape from the society of the recently engaged, which she saw was going to bore her beyond endurance. "I will leave you young people. I daresay"—drawling—"you will find something to say to each other, and Nerine and I will be here in time for tea."

Tea? Agatha had forgotten it.

"Your delightful relative ordered it here with much pomp before he left." Satterlee said, laughing at her blank face. "You see we are under patronage today."

He opened the door for his mother, who placidly assured him that she was quite sure of her way, and had no need of being shown it either by him or by Agatha.

"By the way," Lady Satterlee turned on the threshold and spoke to Agatha, "I mean to carry you and Nerine off with me when I go home next week. I think you have had quite enough of the lonely life you lead here. I am not going to take no for an answer from your stepfather, so you and Bobby may make your plans accordingly."

She entered the morning-room with her refined face very animated, and stood smiling at the door, a delightful object to look upon in her soft chestnut velvets, and the sealskin cloak whose lining of dull pink-and-gold brocade showed as she let it slip from her shoulders.

Nerine, starting to her feet from which she sat huddled on the hearth rug, was an odd contrast to the newcomer. She had on an ancient silk, with a reckless tuck around the skirt; her face looked pale and tired over the penitential tints of her garment, and it gave Lady Satterlee a shock.

"I knew it!" she thought, swiftly. "Oh, I could murder Bobby!"

"May I come in?" she said, taking no notice of the dull eyes, the idle hands of the girl before her. "I have just interviewed your stepfather, and he was as wax before me. Agatha"—with cruel directness, for since she must hurt her auditor, it was best to do it and have it over—"is to be married whenever she pleases, after she becomes of age. You see how carefully anxious your steppapa was to glide out of the question of supplying a trosseau. I did not dispute the question with him, but I stipulated that I was to take you and Agatha home with me, and keep you as long as you would stay with me. What do you say to that idea? Do you think"—her eyes were dwelling on the girl—"that you and I could be happy together?"

A black kettle was boiling on the dull red coals in the grate, a tea table, with brown bread and butter and an equipment very different from that grand tea table of Mr. Mayne's which would be set presently in the drawing-room, stood ready beside it.

Nerine before she answered Lady Satterlee, lifted the boiling kettle and made the tea. It gave her one instant to turn her face away and find words.

"How good you are," she said, very softly. "But two of us would be rather an invasion, I think. And then I have promised Kitty Belton and her mother that the very first time I have the heart to leave Mr. Mayne I will go to Belton."

"You can go there first," she replied, with undiminished zeal, "and then come to me. I will have you, so you need not try to avoid me. I cannot hope to keep Bobby beyond a short leave just now, and Agatha, without you, would not be happy when he had gone."

When he had gone! Agatha, who heretofore had never been happy without her at all! Nerine winced at the sting of this fresh cut.

"You will find that Mr. Mayne will not part with me for two visits." She put the cozy over the teapot with great care, and a determination to stay rooted in Lispenard House forever rather than dwell under Satterlee's roof. "Will you have tea, or is it too early? I must have mine, because I am only just up. Think of that for laziness. Agatha"—smiling—"was up at nine o'clock."

"Mr. Mayne ordered tea in the drawing-room. Do you think I could have both?"

Nerine stood in dumb amazement.

"I have never," she remarked at last, dryly, "had tea with Mr. Mayne in all my life. Do I understand you that he has invited me now, and do you fancy he means to make tea himself? I would give worlds," with ungirlish and hard mirth, "to see my stepfather making tea!"

"He is not going to appear at all, I learned." She had taken a seat in a comfortable armchair beside the tea table. "I think he had quite enough of my society without enduring it at tea; though I don't know"—hastily—"he may be meaning to do so."

A frown gathered on Nerine's face.

"Did you ever have tea made out of a black kettle?" she said. "It will be much nicer than Mr. Mayne's tea. Unless you would rather go back to the drawing-room?"

"I will do whatever you do," Lady Satterlee responded, with delightful promptness. "But I would much prefer to stay here—with the black kettle."

"Will you—really?" Nerine began to pour the thick cream from the old-fashioned jug into the best cup among a remarkable assortment. "But you won't get half such nice things to eat," with candid afterthought; "only bread and butter and cake, and my society thrown in. Nothing would induce me to have tea under the auspices of Mr. Mayne."

"I told Agatha we should come back to tea."

"Agatha will probably discover that you deceived her," said Nerine, with admirable gayety. "I don't think we need trouble to send her word."

As she spoke, Agatha came in—with Kitty Belton and Satterlee, and Nerine, after one quick and terrified instant, in which she felt her heart turn over, went quietly forward and shook hands with him.

What a blessing that she had said her congratulations last night! How should she ever have stammered them out now, with Lady Satterlee's keen eyes on her faltering lips? But how embarrassing it was to have him come in upon her like this, as one of the house, without any warning!

"Agatha might have come first, and gone back for him," she thought, a sudden dryness parching her throat. What were they saying?

Oh! tea.

She went back to her tea, and picked up the cream jug with steady, cold fingers. Satterlee was holding out a cup to be filled.

"We thought you were going to have tea in the drawing-room," Lady Satterlee observed dryly. "And now you have stolen a march on us, and come in here."

"No tea for me with Mr. Mayne!" said Agatha, laughing. "Of course, if you had stayed, I would have; but alone, oh, no!"

Which was exactly how it came to pass that Mr. Mayne, stepping delicately into the drawing-room to do the honors of his faultless tea table, found the room deserted, the birds of high and low degree flown. The steam rose high from the silver urn, the hot cakes nestled snugly in their covered dish, the little round sandwiches and the cakes, in whose making Jane had had no finger, all were tempting the empty air.

Mr. Mayne advanced a step, retired another; then he went over to the tea table as though nothing had happened, and it was a usual thing with him to take tea at five o'clock. He poured if you do not wish, for you've known me only since morning. But that might be long enough to decide whether you can bid me hope. We love and revere the dead heroes and set aside this day for the honoring of their memory, can you not give a little of that love to a living veteran? Can we not make this a memorial day of greater interest to us two, the memorial day of our engagement?"

She could not resist his pleading, even had she wished—and she did not.

"You are a man who has been accustomed to conquering," she said, "and I am afraid you wouldn't allow a woman's 'no' to deter you. I expect I'll have to submit." She smiled into his eyes. "I don't feel that I am taking a chance upon a day's acquaintance. And besides—you've saved Spencer's life again today. You seem to make it a habit and do it every time you meet him, don't you?"

She allowed him to kiss her lips.

from one place to another and they never learn anything worth while; then when they get married they have to learn how to do housework as best they can. They never thank their parents for their kindness (?) but on the contrary reproach them for neglecting their duty.

In a recent issue of COMFORT someone mentioned a club and while ours isn't exactly a club it is something on that order and may give someone an idea. The young people of Jenera have organized a society called the "Victorian Literary Society." Their object is to enable the members to perform on the stage without getting stage fright. They meet every two weeks, on Thursday, and every member is supposed to contribute something to the evening's entertainment such as reading, singing or instrumental music. They meet in the town hall and no admission is charged but a collection is taken at the close of the program. The money is used for new furnishings for the stage, etc. There is a fine of five cents for anyone that is absent without a good excuse, thereby assuring the regular attendance of the members.

Yours truly, CARRIE GOSSMAN.

NEW YORK, N. Y.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Will some of you tell me more about Colorado or any other Western state with a high, dry climate?

I am a poor girl and have lung trouble and catarrh, but am willing to work and can do nearly any kind of work on a farm for I have lived on a farm in Florida. Am of a fearless disposition and don't mind loneliness; in fact, I like quiet country places.

Now can any sister tell me of a place where I can find work and a home in the region above mentioned.

Another thing I would like to ask, how long should a daughter wear mourning for her mother?

I am a girl twenty-one years old, six feet tall, blue gray eyes and light hair and my complexion at present is fair but I like to be tanned and sunburned. Nationality German but I have lived many years in the United States. Am of the Baptist religion.

Lonesome in the heart of the city.

NEILLSVILLE, WIS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND ALL THE SISTERS:

Not seeing any letters from this part of God's beautiful world I take the liberty of dropping in for a quiet chat with you and to tell you about this part of Wisconsin.

This is a highly productive country, land very level, fertile and not much waste land. It is all cut over by large lumber companies who invaded the northern part of the state thirty or more years ago and cut down the large timber and sold land in small tracts as farms, most of it being cleared into good crop yielding land. We can grow almost every growing thing here but dairying is the chief industry. There are fine creameries, cheese factories and also a large milk condensary. The climate is exceptionally good, the air is filled with ozone from the pines in the surrounding forests and the water is pure and free from the all mineral or alkali substances.

A few words on the in-law problem. Aren't most of us an "in-law" to someone? Let us treat him or her, whichever it may be, with as much courtesy as we would like to have shown us and look for the good only and then we will not see the failings so readily.

Mothers, what a blessed privilege is yours to rear and care for the little ones God has placed in your keeping and what accounting will you give Him if you fail in your duty? We all admire a polite child, yet how few mothers insist on teaching politeness and instant obedience to their children. How many times we hear mothers say, "He is only a boy and boys will be boys; if he makes a mistake it will teach him to be careful," but often one mistake will lead to many more. Look as closely to your boy's morals as you do to his diet and his clothes. Your boy is a part of the foundation of our coming generation. What kind of a part will you place there, a good substantial one or a poor counterfeit? Which? Think it over.

The following poem speaks for itself:

Sin Is Sin

"Don't send my boy where your girl can't go
And say, 'There's no danger for you know
Because they all have their wild oats to sow;'
There is no more excuse for my boy to be low
Than your girl, then please don't tell him so.

"Don't send my boy where your girl can't go
For a boy's or a girl's sin is sin you know
And my baby boy's hands are as clean and white
And his heart as pure as your girl's tonight,
Please don't send him where she can't go."

I have been married fourteen years to one of the best "Johns," and we are sweethearts still, being dearer and nearer to each other as the years roll on.

With sincerest best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and all the sisters, I remain, ever,

"A Northern Spy."

MUNDAY, TEXAS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

We are in need of help and have come to you to see if you can be of any assistance.

We live on a nice farm near town and church, and have a car to go in. Our two boys are four and six years old. I am not strong and need a middle-aged woman to live with me, just to help as one of the family and she will be treated as a sister. Would like a good woman at once. Can furnish references.

MRS. W. H. SWAIN.

DELAWARE.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I think COMFORT is the very best paper that could be brought into the home.

I am twenty years old and have been married three years. My husband is about sixteen years my senior and he is very good to me in lots of ways and provides all that I need but he is so quarrelsome that I dread the time when his work is done, though I always appear glad to see him come home. He never thinks I should have anything to say about the home, even to the placing of furniture in the rooms and you know the average man doesn't know how to place things to best advantage. He tells me that he pays for things and that he is going to be boss. Of course that is true, but if a woman has no voice in the affairs of the home she soon feels that she is nothing more than a slave for the man. I have tried every way possible to please him but I seem to fail every time.

I hope I may get some good advice from the sisters that will help me.

Best wishes to all the sisters and Mrs. Wilkinson. L. T.

L. T. You poor little girl, for really you aren't much more than that, how I wish I could help you, but, candidly, I don't know just what I would do if I had a man like yours to deal with—but I'd do something about it and I don't think I'd wait three years either. Maybe some of the sisters can help you—we'd be glad of their ideas on the subject anyway.—Ed.

WILSALL, MONT.

DEAR FRIENDS:

Please let me in your cozy corner this cold March morning. It is twenty below zero up here among the snow-covered peaks of the Rockies. I live in the Shields River valley, the great wheat country. There has been one long train of grain wagons on the road all winter and the ranches are getting rich.

The mountains here are a perfect wonderland of wild flowers. The Forest Ranger presses wild flowers for the Government; he has a press in one corner of his room. He lives up among the wild flowers and they are prettier than any cultivated ones. I am making books of pressed mountain flowers and will exchange them for fancy-work or anything pretty or useful. Will also exchange quilt patterns.

I hope some of the sisters will write to me. I am not very well and get lonely sometimes. I may come again and tell you more about this land where they kill bobcats, coyotes and sometimes mountain lions, and we have elk and deer meat and all kinds of fine fish. Cottonwood Lake, near here, high up in the mountains, is full of fine trout, weighing from five to ten pounds.

Hoping to hear from some of you,

Your friend, LOUVIA COMPTON.

HANNAH, N. DAK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been reading COMFORT for some time and am interested in your corner and Uncle Charlie's, but as I am a very busy woman, trying to make the best of life, I have not had time to write. But I just cannot help but take the time when I read the letter of a new sister who wishes to adopt a child. How I wish I could see and talk to her. I would also like to talk to others who are able to take a child and give the poor little darling a home. God knows if I only had money enough not one would suffer, if I knew it. But I am helpless, all I can do is help find homes for them. Before I was married I worked in an Orphans' Institution. I took care of twenty-eight little boys, from four to twelve years old and they were all very dear to me. If I could only tell all my sisters how pitiful it is to see each eager face when one of the agents come in to pick out one or two children to be taken into a home, each face looked as though it were saying, "Will it be me? Do take me to a home where I can love and be loved." Some would stand with tears in their eyes, so anxious were they to be taken into a real home. That is all they look forward to—a home and someone to love them. My little boys loved me, I might say they almost worshiped me, for I always made them feel that they were my little brothers and that I loved them all. Many times when some were taken away they would come to me for a kiss and a loving word and then go to their new homes and out of my life. Others were so anxious and so happy at leaving that they could not say anything—happy because they were to leave the place where they knew nothing but obey rules and work. If only my sisters could see how the smaller children would flock around a visitor and say, "Are you my mamma?" "Will you take me with you and will you kiss me?" or if they could see some of the nurseries where the children are taken up, bathed, dressed, fed and put to bed again without so much as a loving smile. I think it everyone's duty to make a home for at least one or two helpless children, if they have none of their own. But those who have a home and money want it for themselves, to outdo someone else in dress or household goods when a little of that foolishly spent money would make some little child happy and change its entire life. To those who are able, I say, get busy—there is no time to be wasted.

Loads of love to all, MRS. H. B. B.

VIRGINIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have often wanted to join the band of helpful, kindly sisters who make our department what it is by sharing their good things with others, but for some reason have never found the courage to do so. I have been a reader of this paper for years and you can believe I have especially enjoyed the sisters' letters.

Now for a word to Mary. Really, how could you ever think of marrying anyone you merely respected and not think of loving anyone? You were wise when you refused the ones you did not care for and I don't think you will ever regret it. It will be a long time yet before you will be an old maid—eight years—think what could happen in that time! Love will surely come sometime and then you will think, "What if I had been hasty instead of waiting patiently!" You say you enjoy single life and I am sure you do. Yes, I am single too and just a little older than you. I don't think girls should marry while so young. So few of them realize how serious a step they are taking and can see only the romantic side. I think they should be neat and tidy and endeavor to please after marriage the same as before.

Best wishes for one and all, "NANCY."

WOOD RIVER JCT., R. I.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I want to thank all the sisters and cousins—yes, and brothers, too—who sent cards after my name appeared in COMFORT last May. The kindness of the COMFORT friends was deeply appreciated and I think I have the most interesting collection of cards of anyone in the state.

"Mollie" of Oregon, I wish you had signed your name. Should like to write to you. And will the invalid who wrote to me about lace, write again? I have lost her address. I want to do all I can for invalids and shut-ins, being an invalid myself and confined to my bed almost a year. Let us all remember, dear invalids, that the same Father who watches over the little sparrow, sees all that befalls His human children, and will give us perfect health and strength some day, either in this world or in the Great Beyond. Let us not forget that this life is only a grain of sand, compared to the endless cycles of eternity.

I would like to say a word about the divorce question which has been so freely discussed by the sisters. Mrs. Wilkinson, do you not think one of the greatest causes of divorce is the hasty and unconsidered marriages, so common in our modern life? It seems to me that a long courtship is better than marrying in haste and repenting at leisure. I never heard of an unhappy marriage after a lengthy courtship, but of course there may be such cases.

I notice that Uncle Charlie and others have mentioned the use of paraffin oil as a lubricant for the digestive tract. I would like to warn those who use it not to take it too steadily, as it will cause a relaxed and weakened condition of the bowels, resulting in one of the most trying of troubles—intestinal indigestion. I speak from personal experience, and in my case I have found that the taking of three teaspoons of milk of magnesia, in hot water, every morning, and eating freely of sweet prunes, is far more efficacious and is attended by no ill effects. Indigestion and constipation is often caused by an acid condition of the system and milk of magnesia, being a soluble alkaline, will counteract the acid. Indigestion of the stomach with a feeling of burning heat in that organ is often caused by an excess of hydrochloric acid in the digestive juices. Pepsin and predigested foods only irritate this condition. The best remedy is to eat heartily of plain, wholesome food, carefully avoiding tomatoes and peaches, raw or cooked, and all sour or acid fruits and food, which is poison to those afflicted with this form of indigestion.

Thanking you again for your beautiful cards.

Your sister and cousin, NANCY M. E. STEADMAN.

HAMMONDSPORT, N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been an interested reader of dear old COMFORT for six years and could not do without it. I always turn first to the Sisters' Corner and read every letter. It is interesting to note the different views on the same subjects; for instance, the divorce question. I, for one, do not believe in it. My views are the same as Evangeline Doble's and if other mothers would teach their daughters as Mrs. Doble has taught hers there would be far less trouble and divorce. If girls would stop to think twice before marrying they would save themselves and others much trouble. Most girls are so afraid of being called an "old maid," but that is much better than being an unloved and neglected wife or the wife of a drunkard. Don't you agree with me?

Sister Mary, of Oklahoma, I want to write a few lines just for you. Pay no attention to your friends when they say you will be an old maid. You are not old now and have lots of time to find one you will love and, dear, if you never do, living single is heaven compared with living all your life with someone you do not love and I think it is very wrong for anyone to take the marriage vows and swear to "love, honor and obey" when there is no love in their heart. Many of you will say, "what does she know about it?" But, even if I am unmarried, I have seen the sorrow and trouble that is made with others.

How can mothers say they prefer the city to the country for their children? How many of the mothers who prefer city life would like to have been in New York City last summer during that awful infantile paralysis epidemic, with their beloved children? I just think you would have wished for the country. A lady who lived in Brooklyn but whose mother lives here, was not long in leaving and you would have done the same thing.

As all the sisters describe themselves I will do the same. I was twenty-two years old last August. Have blue eyes, dark brown hair and fair complexion. Height five feet five inches tall and weigh one hundred and ten pounds.

I would very much like to hear from girls between the ages of twenty and thirty years, who live in Warren, Erie and Crawford counties, Pennsylvania, and would also like to hear from girls from the different states, who are near my age. I will try my best to answer all I receive.

Wishing God's best blessing for COMFORT, Mrs. Wilkinson, Uncle Charlie and all the sisters,

Your sincere sister, MISS ESTELLA M. FRAVER.

WALNUT RIDGE, ARK.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Here comes a sister from the "Bear State." My parents died when I was very young and I was cast upon the world to fight my way with the rest. I am now twenty-two years old and married and have the sweetest little girl in Arkansas. She is nine months old. My husband and I live on a farm and we are as happy as the birds that sing in the woods around us. We prefer farm life to city life as we can get the full benefit of God's great world. The beautiful Black river flows by our farm on its way to the Mississippi.

To those who are troubled and discouraged I say, "Read COMFORT." I know a great many have been helped by it.

I have a little prayer that may benefit someone so will pass it along:

"Father of light and life, thou good supreme!
Oh, teach me what is good; teach me Thyself!
Save me from folly, vanity and vice;
From every low pursuit,
And fill my soul with knowledge, conscious peace and virtue pure;
Sacred, substantial, never fading bliss!"

Wishing you, one and all, health, happiness and prosperity, your sister, MRS. LULA SISSON.

MISSOURI.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Let me have a word in your department. I saw Mary's letter and wish to give my experience. Her friends say she will be an "old maid." My friends say the same thing about me. I had beaux and offers of marriage but I didn't love any of them. I always said I would never marry unless I loved the man I married. I was twenty-seven years old before I met that man. Some may think that too old to marry but I think I did right to wait. I am happy with the man I love but if I had married for respect, as Mary suggests, in all probability I would have soon found faults that would in time have made me despise the man I married.

Tell Mary to wait until she finds the man she can love and she will never regret it. She isn't so very old.

Greetings to all the sisters and Mrs. Wilkinson,

A sister in the Ozarks.

PARIS, 437 Bonham St., TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have just finished reading COMFORT and please allow me to repeat, "whoever named it, named it well." I am a stranger to the readers of this good paper but expect a kindly greeting as all the true and lovable people of this world welcome strangers. I believe the writers are true Christians, for as the heart thinks, so speaks the man. I hope all the readers may profit by the inspiring letters as I have done. I have felt discouraged at times, believing that people of this age were deeper in sin than ever before. The world in general is cruel and untrue, being false even to themselves. However, to read the letters in COMFORT broadens the sense of view that we might see more of the good and blind our eyes to the bad.

I called on a lady a few days ago who has kept in touch with the great wars. She has noted every battle and lately become alarmed, believing the end of time is near. As she wiped the tears from her eyes and smoothed back her silver locks she said, "we would live a better life and sacrifice the world if we knew that great and awful day was near." I wonder why she can't grasp the idea that for her the end truly is near. She will soon have lived her threescore and ten years, and when she has passed into the Great Beyond, time to her will be no more. Though earth may stand a thousand years, her destiny will remain unchanged. No future hour can come wherein she might recall the past. Every day is the end of time for thousands, both young and old. Perhaps for you and me tomorrow's sun will never shine. I was always impressed upon reading the last words of one crossing the Great Divide. It was the dying Wadsworth who whispered, "Is that you, Dora?" And George Washington said, "It is well." "Now comes the mystery," said Henry Ward Beecher. What a great consolation to the deaf Beethoven when he murmured, "I shall hear in Heaven." Grander still the utterance of the dying Stephen, as he beheld the opening Heavens, "Lord, Jesus, receive my spirit." But higher and grander than all, the last sigh of the Son of Mary on Calvary, "It is finished."

It was my dear teacher, Miss Amy Roberts, who taught a little Mission Sunday school class in Topeka, Kansas, sixteen years ago and who impressed so forcibly on my mind how much the Savior suffered that we might live.

I hope we all read the letters describing the Mountain Climbers and will be ever ready to lift humanity (I have forgotten whose letter it was.) It would be much easier to climb if we would forget the world and set our hearts on things eternal, remembering that Christ is not a faraway spirit who is deaf to our feeble prayers, but a personal Savior who hears the least of our petitions, even though they remain unspoken. He is nearer, and should be dearer, even than our mother. However, I believe that Christian mothers are far above the angels. The man spoke well who said, "God could not be everywhere so He sent mothers." Think of the days and months and years she has patiently guided our footsteps safely through the storms until we reached the years of accountability and entered life's battle alone. If then we will remember mother's prayers we may march away beneath the shelter of Him who said, "I will never forsake thee."

Miss Lillian Harrell, I intended writing you, but lost your address.

May-Day Festivities

by C. L. Cheever

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THERE is an unconscious nature-worship which springs up in every heart and finds expression on every sweet May morning for:

"The flowery May who from her green lap throws
The yellow cowslip and the pale primrose,
* * * * * * * * * * *
Thus we salute thee with our early song,
And welcome thee and wish thee long."

No one cares to resist that delicious spring feeling and we long to shake off all work and walk into the country as far as we can; but of the May-days of two hundred years or more ago we know so little in this twentieth century with its hurry and we have only the memories which old chroniclers have handed down to us of the quaint old May-day customs.

In some country villages there may still be found a few simple demonstrations. Though the hanging of May baskets is still in vogue in the New England States, of dancing about the May-pole with its attendant displays there is little or no enthusiasm shown.

In the long ago the ceremonies devoted to May-day there were elements of the ancient sun worship and nature worship of the far East.

On the first of May all manner of sports, music and dancing were indulged in, and were supposed to be a good omen for the success of the crops of the coming season. In olden times the May-feast was one of the great events of the year, and it was made a day of revelry and rejoicing. Long before sunrise parties of young people went to the near-by woods and fields to gather the sweet-scented hawthorne known as the Mayflower in England; this became such a part of the festivities that gathering of hawthorne came to be spoken of as "gathering the May." It was for this Mayflower (hawthorne) that the ship which brought the Pilgrim colonists to New England was named.

The leading feature, however, of May-day sports was raising the May-pole which had been brought into the village with much ceremony, and the people, old and young, gave themselves up to the full enjoyment of the pleasures of the day.

The May-pole was covered all over with flowers and herbs and bound about with ribbons, and men, women and children feasted and danced about it.

It was customary to have a Lord of May as well as the Queen of May. In the evening, when the great bonfires were lighted, the Queen of May, who presided over the festivities of the day, withdrew with her companions, and the King of May, was left to continue the revels of the night.

It is said that in his younger days King Henry VIII delighted to rise with the sun on May mornings and ride into the woods with his court.

In England, in the last century, the milkmaid's dance formed a very interesting and lovely feature of the May-day shows.

Among the Irish and Scotch Highlanders May-day was known as "The Day of Belen's Fire." The herdsmen of every village would cut a square trench in the ground, make a fire of wood, on which they would dress a large caudle of eggs, butter, oatmeal and milk, and bring, besides plenty of beer and whiskey; for each of the company contributed something for the feast.

There was an ancient superstition among the natives that if a woman was the first to cross the Barvas river in the Isle of Lewis on May-day the salmon would not come into the river for a whole year. So to guard against this disastrous possibility, a man was appointed every year to cross the river as soon as sunrise and the women were forbidden to stir until they knew that this important ceremony had been done.

Another superstition for the day is that if you look through smoked glass into an unused well, you will see your future husband or wife.

May-day ceremonies were for the people, and had no purpose beyond that of pure enjoyment. The cost of some of the May-poles and their immense size may still be found in some of the old accounts of the various parishes of London.

The Puritans were great enemies of May-games and the May-pole, and during Cromwell's time all such sports were prohibited, and all May-poles ordered to be taken down and burned. So that it is readily seen that the Puritans regarded these sports as in a measure idolatrous and they felt the responsibility of keeping the new America free from such festivals so that in our country these days of merry-making never became fully established. They were equally averse to the celebration of Christmas.

There is a record of an early attempt to establish old English festivities in New England. When some newcomers refused to work on Christmas Day because of their conscientious scruples, the Governor told them that "if it was a matter of conscience, he would spare them until they were better informed," and so led away the rest of the people and left them. When they came home at noon from their work the Governor "found them in the street playing openly," so he went to them and took away their implements of amusement, and told them that it was against his conscience that they should play while others worked.

All over Europe the songs of spring and May-time are to be found and some of them are very beautiful. The music of May-day endured long after the ceremonies ceased to be.

"Can such delights be in the street
And open fields, and we not see't?
Come, we'll abroad; and let's obey
The proclamation made for May;
And sin no more as we have done by staying;
But, my Corinna, come, let's goe a-Maying."

Robt. Herrick.

It is a pity that some of these pretty customs are not now in vogue for the celebration of May-day, and it would be well to revive them for a spring holiday devoted to out-door merry-making and Nature-study.

Use the Safe Polish

You are right to refuse any other than the tried-and-true cleaner and polish for your highly-prized possessions. It doesn't pay to take a chance with your beautiful piano, a dear oil heirloom, or any choice bit of furniture. You too, like more than a million other women, can depend for safe and certain results on

LIQUID VENEER

Endorsed by the National Housewives' League

It isn't a mineral oil, so it can never soften, darken or discolor a brilliant finish; nor spread a greasy film to catch dust and soil clothing. If that has happened, Liquid Veneer will remedy the damage—but begin with it and let Liquid Veneer keep all your furniture and woodwork as beautiful, clean and brilliant as new. It is true economy—both in the using of it, and the refinishing cost it will save.

The ideal way to use Liquid Veneer is with our new L-V Dust Cloth—you can get one free with a 50c. bottle on any Friday. Ask your dealer, or write us enclosing top of 50c. package.

This department, which is conducted by eminent specialists and experts in the various branches of agricultural science and practical, business farming, will keep our readers posted on the latest scientific discoveries and teach them the best methods of operating in order to obtain GREATER FARM PROFITS AND BETTER HOME LIVING.

Any COMFORT subscriber can have the advice of our Agricultural Staff free on questions relating to farming, live stock and dairying. The answers will be printed in this department and will be interesting and instructive to all who are concerned in farming.

Write your questions plainly on one side of the paper only; give your full name and address, and direct your letter to COMFORT'S MODERN FARMER, Augusta, Maine.

Milk Must Be Fed

THERE is no other article of human or animal food so important as milk. Aside from eggs milk is the only perfect food. It is nature's food and furnishes to the young and growing animal all those elements that are essential for life, growth and reproduction.

In one of the large experiment stations there has been conducted a series of experiments that demonstrate the necessity of milk for proper growth. In these experiments animals have been fed on chemically perfect foods, but containing neither milk nor anything made from milk. These animals almost always show poor and unsatisfactory growth and when mature fail to reproduce. Various animals from rats to calves have been fed by these methods and all alike show marked deficiencies in growth when milk is lacking.

These experiments show that the farmer who expects to succeed with pigs or calves must keep a portion of his milk at home to be fed on the farm. They show that the dairyman who sells all his milk to the condensary or to be used in city consumption must buy cows to renew his herd. He cannot raise them successfully or expect to grow pigs with profit.

The farmer who sells his cream for butter making or for city use always has the skim-milk left at home for feed. This enables him to raise his calves, grow pigs for pork successfully and to raise chickens at a profit. While he will not get so much money from the cream as from the sale of milk, the added profit which he is able to make from the animals which he is able to grow will in the end make up for what he loses by not selling whole milk instead of cream.

There is still another factor which must not be lost sight of. When skim-milk is fed on the farm its fertility value is kept up. Little fertility is lost in the sale of cream.

The Corn Root Louse

Most people do not know the peculiar habits of the corn root louse. It passes the winter in the egg stage in the nests of small ants that inhabit the corn fields. In the spring after the corn has grown roots the lice live on the roots by sucking the sap from the plants. The ants protect them and preserve their eggs over winter because the ants use the lice in much the same manner that the farmer uses the dairy cows. The lice have little teats in their bodies which secrete a sweet fluid often known as "honey dew." The ants feed on this "honey dew" hence they protect the lice in order to milk them. This association in lice and ants is generally common for all classes of these insects. The next time you see a lot of lice on plants be sure to notice if the ants are not close by.

Numerous ant hills in the corn field may be an indication of lice on the corn roots. The remedy is to destroy the ant hills by fall plowing and freezing and by rotation of crops.

Sweet Clover

Sweet clover is a plant coming rapidly into popular favor. But a few years ago it was outlawed as a weed and many states passed laws providing for its exermination. Now, however, it is looked upon not as a weed but as a plant fit for cultivation and having high value as a food for stock. The change came about in this way:

The alfalfa craze has swept over the land. All over the country the agricultural colleges are preaching alfalfa and farmers are experimenting with its culture. But alfalfa will not grow well unless the soil has been "inoculated." It was very early learned that sweet clover soil contained the proper germs for the "inoculation" of alfalfa fields. Alfalfa sown on soils that produced good crops of sweet clover was found to grow readily. In this way the roadside weed became the farmers' friend.

But the farmer soon discovered that the two plants resembled each other in many ways. He tried alfalfa and found it excellent food for stock and he reasoned that another plant so much like it must also make good feed, so he tried sweet clover also. Experiment stations have also taken up these tests and the once despised weed is now proving that it too may soon become a plant regularly cultivated on many farms.

Sweet clover has high feeding value, better than ordinary clover, and grows rapidly. If cut early, just before blossoming time and before the stem becomes woody, it is readily and greedily eaten by stock and makes an excellent hay.

However, sweet clover runs its race in two years and like other clover it must be reseeded. In this respect it is not the equal of alfalfa which lives on from year to year.

There are two varieties of sweet clover,—the white and the yellow. In the tests thus far conducted the yellow variety on account of its finer habit of growth is preferred as a hay crop. Like other clovers this plant is a nitrogen gatherer and for this reason is especially valuable in building up the fertility of the soil. Unlike alfalfa it can be grown on sandy soils with comparative ease.

Sweet clover has been tried out extensively in the irrigated sections of the West. The Wyoming Station reports a fair yield from poor soils unsuited to other crops. On good soils with proper care this station has been able to secure two cuttings. The second yield is from two to three tons per acre. It is usually sown at the rate of about ten pounds, with oats as a nurse crop. In some places it is scattered on the snow in winter. The alternate freezing and thawing cracks the hard seed coat and makes the seed germinate more readily in the spring. As the snow melts away the seed is carried down into the earth and is sufficiently covered by natural forces. Winds and freshets will carry many of the seeds away, however, when sown on the snow.

Many Uses for the Soy Bean

The soy bean now promises to become one of the most useful of American crops. It is already used in more ways than almost any other crop grown in this country.

Soy beans are legumes and have the power of taking nitrogen from the air. When grown on poor sandy land and plowed under they add nitrogen, increase the organic matter and the power of the soil to hold moisture.

Soy beans are valuable as a food for both man and beast. In Japan they play a very important part as human food. They are eaten as green beans, made into pickles, used in soups or cooked as dry beans. They are ground and made into flour from which bread, biscuits and crackers are made.

Soy beans are rich in oil which is easily extracted by heat and pressure. This oil is also used as food. It makes excellent paints, soaps, varnishes and is also used as a lubricant. One ton of soy beans yields about thirty gallons of oil.

After the oil is expressed the cake remaining is one of the very best of stock foods, worth at present prices of feed about forty dollars per ton. It is one of the best high protein feeds and an excellent milk producer. For the same reason it is a good food for laying hens. Fed to horses, cattle, sheep and hogs it takes the place of oil meal.

The green beans may be cut before ripening and made into an excellent hay. This hay has about the same value as alfalfa when fed to stock for the production of meat or milk.

In Japan and China other uses for the soy bean have been found. An artificial milk is made from the bean which takes the place of cow's milk in cooking and candy making. It is also roasted, ground and used as a substitute for coffee.

Concrete on the Farm

Concrete is now regarded as necessary as lumber on the farm. If properly made it is indestructible. Buildings constructed of concrete are permanent, hence more care and thought for the future is necessary in placing them where they are always to stand. If rearrangement should later become desirable it must be remembered that the concrete structure can't be moved. "It stays put" hence it should be put where it ought to stay.

HOW TO MAKE CONCRETE.—The standard concrete mixture is a one-two-four compound. This means that to one part of cement two parts of sand and four parts of clean gravel or crushed rock should be added. The sand must be clean and sharp, not too fine. Dirt spoils the best concrete. If gravel is to be used it should be run over a fine screen to remove all fine dirt, then run over a coarse one so that all stones over two inches in diameter will be taken out. Crushed rock makes better concrete than gravel because it is clean and the edges are sharp. Cement sticks to crushed rock better than to smooth gravel.

MIX BEFORE ADDING WATER.—The sand, rock and cement should be thoroughly mixed before water is added. Each particle of sand and gravel should have its surface thoroughly coated with cement. This will cause the particles to be bound together. The cement is like glue, it does the binding. Water should be added to form a soft mass that will pour from a pail. The water combines with the cement to form the solid mass. Poor concrete is often the result of using too little water. Wet concrete sets slower but is much harder when it does set. It is often a good plan to throw water on concrete every few days until it is finally set. When concrete "drinks up" water rapidly one may know that it needs water to set properly.

CONCRETE FOUNDATIONS.—All farm buildings of whatever sort or material should rest on concrete foundations. These foundations should be dug into the ground below the frost line which of course varies with different localities. Buildings resting on concrete foundations imbedded in the earth below the frost line will neither heave nor settle. Foundations may be made of a weaker strength, from the standard up to a one-three-five mixture,—that is, one part of cement to three parts of sand and five parts of crushed rock.

CONCRETE TANKS.—For concrete tanks to be set below the surface the same mixture should be used as for foundations. These tanks should extend, or rest on foundations extending below the frost line. Watering troughs, milk cooling vats and septic tanks are now usually made of concrete.

CONCRETE WALKS AND FLOORS.—For walks and floors the standard one-two-four mixture should be used. This should be surfaced with a one inch layer of one-one, that is one part each of cement and sand mixed. This gives a fine hard wearing surface such as is needed in walks and floors. The important point in laying walks and floors is to have them well drained beneath. Cinders or sand six inches in depth should be placed beneath all walks and floors so that water will not collect beneath, freeze and heave and crack the concrete. This is the most important point in concrete construction. Walks and floors should be laid in small squares of four or five feet each way. These squares should be separated by a strip of building paper. This makes sufficient allowance for temperature expansions and if well made and properly drained cement laid in this manner will never crack.

The Farm Tractor

What does it cost to keep a team? It is said that one fifth of the farm acreage of the United States is used to produce feed for the work horses used thereon. If this be true there is opportunity to release this acreage for the production of human food if some satisfactory substitute for horse power can be had. This is the function of the farm tractor now being rapidly introduced. This statement must not be understood to mean that the size of every farm can be increased twenty per cent by the substitution of the tractor for horses. The small farms will profit most.

What does it cost to keep a two-horse team? How many acres are necessary? Let us make a little calculation.

The average work team eats six tons of Timothy or mixed hay and about 300 bushels of oats in a year if they are kept at reasonably steady work. To produce the hay will require from four to five acres of land, and to grow the oats from eight to 10 acres, using average yields as a basis for calculation. In addition to this another acre is needed for pasture or exercise lot. So you have at least fifteen acres given over to each team of horses used on the farm.

The twenty-acre farm using horse power is an impossibility since the greater share of the land is used to maintain the power. This is probably the reason why the twenty-acre farm, the forty-acre farm, and in many localities the eighty-acre farm has gone out of fashion. It has been crowded out because so large a proportion of the land was necessary to raise feed for the horses. The man on the small farm cannot afford to keep a team.

Now comes the small tractor designed to take the place of the horse team on small farms. These machines have so recently made their appearance that we have no definite knowledge as to their practicability or their effect upon the soil. But they are here and if they are not now practical they will be made practical. If their use should work harm to the soil, ways will be found to overcome these defects.

The small tractor is going to make the small farm possible. The small farm means more families on the land, which means greater intensity of culture, which in turn means more crops. This will in a measure tend to offset the rapidly increasing cost of living, about which we hear so much.

Welcome the small tractor.

Mushrooms and Toadstools

When a plant of the toadstool family is fit for human food we usually call it a mushroom. If it is poisonous we say it is a toadstool. Many people have been poisoned by making the mistake of eating toadstools for mushrooms.

BEWARE OF THE TOADSTOOL.—It is not easy to tell the difference between a mushroom which is edible and a toadstool which is not. A safe rule to follow is to let them alone if you are not sure of their nature.

Some Safe Rules

I. Never eat any mushroom in the button stage, that is before it has opened. It is always difficult to distinguish between poisonous and edible species in this stage. Only the expert of long experience can distinguish between "buttons" fit for food and those that are not.

II. Never eat mushrooms having white gills and a bulb at the base of the stem. The most poisonous ones are of this description.

III. Never eat a mushroom having a milk-like juice.

IV. If the mushroom has a thin cap and thick gills, leave it alone.

V.—Never eat mushroom unless strictly fresh. The poisons in some species develop with age.

Mushrooms That Can be Easily Distinguished with a Little Practise.

1. The common morel, found in the spring of the year, is so different from the toadstool as to be easily recognized. It is shaped like an inverted pear and its outer surface is covered with holes. It may be likened to a pear-shaped sponge.

2. The common meadow mushroom has a straight stem without a bulb at the base. It has a ring around the stem at the base. Its gills are pink or red and it always grows in the sunshine in open pastures, never in the dense woods in the fall.

3. The common puff ball while still fresh and white is edible. A little practise in company with an experienced mushroom collector will soon enable the amateur to select the above three forms for human food with perfect safety.

Growing Mushrooms

Mushrooms are not easy to grow. The spawn is planted the same as other seeds of other plants and the mushrooms spring over night from the spawn. Those interested in the cultivation of this plant should send to the U. S. Department of Agriculture for Farmers' Bulletin No. 204, on "The Cultivation of Mushrooms."

Rash Operating is Dangerous

Some farmers seem to entertain the erroneous idea that nerve is the chief requisite when operating upon a horse for fistula of the poll or withers, or remedying a rupture, or removing a tumor, or opening an abscess or even unnerving a horse. Castration too is considered an easy job, if a man only has the necessary nerve. Please understand that skill, training and cleanliness are of far greater importance than nerve in this matter. We know of one nervy, ignorant chap who operated upon a poll evil by free use of a big, sharp butcher knife. When the horse's head dropped to the ground and could not be brought back again he learned that there is a large ligament, known as the ligamentum nuchae present for the purpose of supporting a horse's head and that the trained surgeon is careful not to cut it off. Better employ an expert when cutting has to be done, or learn from him how to do it correctly. If an abscess has to be opened and one is not informed as to the anatomy of the part, cut through the skin only, at the softest part, and then work through the undelying tissues by means of a comparatively blunt probe, or the clean handle of a pen, or a clean meat skewer. By this means it is possible to open into the abscess of "poll evil" or the parotid gland without great danger to the horse, whereas free use of the knife might cause death by severing an important artery. If a man feels that he is "handy with a knife" and likes to attempt the "doctoring" of animals let him go to a regular veterinary college and learn the business properly. There is room in the profession for good men and profit in the work. The "smarty" who thinks he is qualified to practise and yet has had no training whatever is a menace to both animals and patrons. He should be left strictly alone.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming.

Questions and Answers

RECIPE FOR GRAFTING WAX.—Will you kindly give me the recipe and tell me how to make grafting wax? Would it be all right to graft a pear on any other kind of tree?

MRS. S. E. S., White Cloud, Mich.

A.—To make grafting wax melt together four parts resin, two parts beeswax, one part beef tallow. Do this in a double boiler, not over an open fire since there is danger of explosion of resin. Mix thoroughly and let it cool. We do not advise grafting pears on other kinds of fruit trees. Only an expert who understands the process can succeed and then only with certain kinds of trees. Graft pear on pear only; probably you could not make it live if you tried to graft it on any other kind of tree.

LOBSTER CACTUS.—I have had the lobster, otherwise called the crab, cactus five years and they do not bloom. What can I do to make them bloom? Please also let me know the price of your primroses by the dozen.

MRS. J. E., Lyons, N. Y.

A.—Try transplanting to open ground in summer. Choose a dry, sandy, well drained soil. When transplanted for winter in pots use stones and broken pieces of pot in bottom to give good drainage. Transplant in light, sandy soil, covering the top of pot with fine gravel one inch deep. Make the soil like that of the desert. Don't water too much. On the other hand never let the soil become bone dry. Write advertisers for prices on primroses; we have no primroses.

DISINFECTING SEED POTATOES.—Pease tell me how to treat seed potatoes with formaldehyde for scab.

MRS. R. S., Bisher, Mont.

A.—Mix one pint of formalin (formaldehyde) in thirty gallons of water. Place the potatoes in slat boxes and immerse in the solution for two hours; then dry the potatoes.

CABBAGE YELLOW.—Please tell me what kills my cabbages. Just as they begin to head the leaves turn yellow and fall off as though something had eaten the pith out of them. The soil is black, sandy with clay foundation on a hillside. I use only stable manure for fertilizer and all other crops do well except cabbage.

MRS. A. K., Ramer, Tenn.

A.—This is a serious disease of cabbage which has been mastered at the Wisconsin Agricultural Experiment Station, Madison, Wis. Write to Prof. L. R. Jones of that station as it may be possible to obtain some seed of his resistant cabbage. This variety has been carefully bred and is quite resistant against the disease, succeeding finely on infected fields where ordinary cabbage dies from yellows. There is no such disease as "hollow horn." It is a myth. The horns of all adult cattle are hollow. Malignant catarrh, however, may cause pus in the horn cores and that disease is highly contagious and incurable.

SOIL NEEDS POTASH.—Our garden soil is rich and black and grows all kinds of vegetables to perfection, except potatoes. Our potatoes run mostly to vines and produce few potatoes and small at that. The land has been well manured; we have tried new seed and have given them the best of cultivation, but it makes no difference. The soil does not scour the plow and is so soft that it is difficult to plow. Why do we not get a good potato crop?

MRS. O. F. L., Judson, Minn.

A.—The soil referred to is exceedingly rich in humus or decayed vegetable matter which supplies much nitrogen but insufficient mineral matter, particularly potash, for potatoes. If you could top dress heavily with sand and sandy loam and apply a potash manure potatoes would be likely to thrive, provided the plot is not heavily shaded by trees. Too much shade will make successful potato raising impossible. No matter what may be the character and condition of the soil.

Stops Corn Pain! Corns Lift Out With Fingers

Few Drops Takes Soreness From Corns and Calluses and They Lift Off.

A noted Cincinnati chemist discovered a new ether compound and called it freezone and it now can be had in tiny bottles as here shown for a few cents from any drug store.

You simply apply a few drops of freezone upon a tender corn or painful callus and instantly the soreness disappears, then shortly you will find the corn or callus so loose that you can just lift it off with the fingers.

No pain, not a bit of soreness, either when applying freezone or afterwards and it doesn't even irritate skin.

Hard corns, soft corns or corns between the toes, also toughened calluses just shrivel up and lift off so easy. It is wonderful! Seems magical. It works like a charm. If your druggist doesn't have freezone tell him to order a small bottle for you from any wholesale house. Edward Wesley Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Ducks and Guinea Fowl

DUCKS and guinea fowl are very profitable stock on a farm, or where they can have plenty of range, for guinea fowl will find the larger part of their own feed. Even when the eggs are hatched under hens, the hen can be released at the end of four weeks, and the youngsters will come up at night with full crops; and until marketed in the fall, they need have nothing but a little cracked corn at night, just to bring them home regularly and keep them tame.

The guinea fowl need no special house, all that is necessary for their comfort being a roost high up in a shed. If left to themselves they take to the trees, and in all probability will get frozen if the winters should be severe, so the safest plan with new birds is to cover the front of a shed with two-inch wire netting, just tacking it up lightly, so that it can easily be removed at the end of two or three weeks, when they are accustomed to their new quarters.

While they are prisoners, feed two or three times a day; about half a pint of mixed wheat and cracked corn night and morning, and at noon about half the quantity of grain, with a little chopped meat or ground bone alternating with vegetables. All this food should be cut quite small, or the guineas will not eat it. Like other birds, they must have a constant supply of sharp grit and fresh water.

As a market commodity they have been growing in favor for the last five years, since, like squabs, they take the place of game during the closed season.

Guinea fowls commence laying when the first warm days come in April. As it is their natural instinct to be very secretive about laying, some patience and diplomacy are necessary to locate their nests. The usual spot selected is a hollow in the ground, by the root of a tree or fence post well screened by brush. Don't attempt to approach it while they are in sight. Go away, and return later armed with a long handled spoon. The eggs are almost the color of the earth and often covered with fallen leaves, so it needs a sharp eye to detect them. Be very careful not to touch the nest with your hand. Guineas seem able to scent the human hand about the nest; they can also count up to three. For that reason leave that number of eggs in the nest, removing the others with the spoon to insure there being no telltale clew left to arouse Mrs. Guinea's suspicion.

When you have fifteen stolen eggs, get a box a foot square, turn it on the side, and across the bottom of the open front nail a slat, behind which place a nest of soft hay. Stand this nest box inside (at one end) of another box, two and a half feet long, with sides a foot or more deep. Make a cover of wire netting for the large box, to open like a lid. Scatter sand on the floor, nail up a small drinking pan in one corner, and you have a safe, rat-proof coop for Biddy and the eggs. Another motive for the outer box is that baby guineas are so very little, so wild, and so easily frightened, that they are apt to quit the nest as soon as hatched, get lost, become chilled, and die.

It takes from twenty-five to twenty-six days to incubate guinea eggs. The brood coop to be used the first two weeks should be on the same principle as the nest boxes, and even when they are on the grass run, you must exercise the greatest caution to avoid anything like cracks and crevices in or around the sides, for they are such mites, and have such capacity for crawling through the eyes of needles, that special care is necessary. If some knot-hole or some depression in the ground has escaped your notice and a baby does stray off, go about two yards away and remain perfectly still. Don't be impatient. It may be ten minutes before you hear anything. Then, unless all hope is over, you will hear a plaintive little cry. Do not move until it has been repeated three or four times, and you are quite sure where it comes from. Then make a sudden dive and secure the truant, which is usually under a tuft of grass or in some little hole. If you move about while hunting for him, there won't be a sound, and you may search all day with little success.

Bill of Fare for Baby Guineas

Give nothing for the first twenty-four hours, then the daily bill of fare should be as follows: First feed, 7 A. M.—Crushed hempseed, half a cup; stale bread crumbs, half a cup; moisten with raw eggs.

Second feed, 9 A. M.—Millet seed.

Third feed, 11.30 A. M.—Chopped onion tops, half a cup of corn-meal that has been steamed as for chicks, half a teaspoonful of crushed mustard seed, mixed and fed crumblingly.

Fourth feed, 2 P. M.—Pinhead oats, crushed a little finer than when it is bought.

Fifth feed, 5 P. M.—Liver that has been half boiled, cracked wheat and corn, equal parts.

These bills of fare can be varied with pot cheese, custard, chopped lettuce or apple, bread crumbs moistened with milk, hard boiled eggs; but every day they must have meat (more than chicks need), and pepper or mustard seed crushed and fed in soft wood. Keep a small pan of powdered charcoal and sand in the run, and, of course, water in a drinking fountain that will only allow the beak to get wet.

Ducks are coming to the fore with a rush in this country, and I predict that within another year America will have followed the lead of England and Australia, and duck farming will be as common as farming, as the demand for eatable birds and eggs has increased steadily for the last five years. And, judging from the letters I have received during the last few months, asking for information about duck raising, our readers are awakening to the fact that there is money in ducks.

The first point for the beginner to grasp is the difference in breeds, for not all ducks are money makers. There are quite a number of breeds, the principal of which are Pekin, Aylesbury, Rouen, Crested, Indian Runner, and Muscovy.

The Pekins are creamy white, with reddish orange shanks and feet, and weigh at maturity, drakes, eight pounds; ducks, seven. The Aylesbury are pure white, shanks and feet light orange; drake nine pounds, duck eight. The Rouen drake's head and neck are green, with a white collar. Body, ashy gray, mixed with green. Breast, purplish brown; underbody steel gray. Weight, nine pounds. The ducks are principally light brown, penciled with darker brown and green; weight eight pounds. The Crested are pure white ducks, with pronounced crests or topknots. Drake weighs seven pounds, duck six. There are two varieties of Muscovy—the pure white, with a red, wrinkled skin on their faces, and orange shanks and feet; the colored Muscovys are black and white heads, with the same odd, wrinkled skin on their faces as the white ones. Their backs are blue-black, sometimes broken with white feathers; shanks and feet, from yellow to dark red color, or even black. Drakes, ten pounds; ducks, eight.

There are two varieties of Indian Runner ducks—one pure white, the other light fawn and white or gray and white. The fawn and white are the most popular among breeders. The side of the face should be fawn or gray; throat pure white; breast and shoulders fawn or gray, running to white; tail, fawn or gray. Drakes weigh four and a half pounds; ducks, four.

When it comes to market purposes, we narrow down to Pekins and Indian Runners, Pekins being preferred, in most markets, for table birds; and they are certainly the most profitable for that purpose, because they grow very quickly, being ready for market when six to nine weeks old, when they will weigh from four to six pounds apiece, if they have been well fed and kept in yards, away from ponds and streams; and in the wholesale market they bring about eighteen cents a pound.

As egg producers, Indian Runner ducks are the wonders of the poultry world, for they have outstripped all records. One breeder in Indiana, who had three hundred and fifty birds, affirms that on January 25th he commenced shipping eggs for hatching, and sent out thirty-six thousand by July 25th, and that each duck (the stock consisted of three hundred ducks and fifty drakes) averaged ten dollars a year, the average yield being ninety-nine eggs for each bird in one hundred and eight days. In New Zealand a two years' contest was conducted, one duck laying five hundred and twelve eggs in twenty-three months, and was still laying an egg a day, even though she was moulting. They are strong, healthy, easy to raise, develop very rapidly, and will, under good conditions, commence to lay before they are five months old.

There are many points in favor of duck culture, as they are free from lice, roup, scabby legs, and other diseases so common to chickens.

These ducks are hardy and vigorous, and as their chief characteristics are their laying qualities, they have come to stay, and the one who gives them special attention will realize a good profit from them in the future.

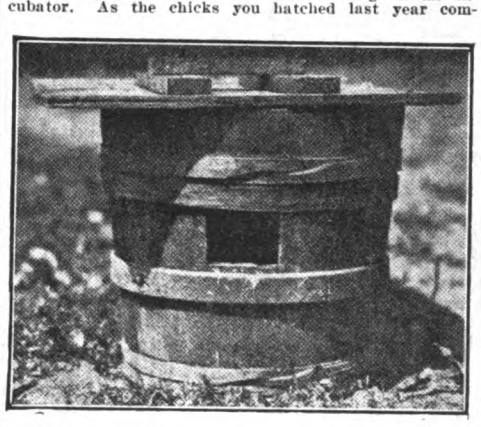
Running water is not at all necessary to their development, but they must have plenty of clean, fresh water for drinking purposes. They are great foragers, and find a part of their food when given free range, but they can be successfully handled in limited quarters. A two-foot fence is sufficient to inclose them.

One of the secrets of success is to start with pure bred stock, for blood will tell with ducks as with other poultry.

Keep one drake for every seven or eight ducks and fatten the rest for market when nine or ten weeks old. At this age we dress them and sell them to private parties for fifty and sixty cents each. Some work, but it pays. But eggs are what you should work for, and the flock should be large enough to enable you to market them by the case.

To get winter eggs, laying ducks should have an inclosed house, but after May they do better if allowed to run out all the time, but should be penned at night until nine o'clock the next morning, when they will be through laying for the day. The eggs are larger than hens' eggs, and they command from five to ten cents higher than hens' eggs in the commercial markets.

Laying ducks should be fed a damp mash composed of bran, shorts, corn meal and beef scrap twice each day, with whole corn at night. Never feed quite all they will eat. Sand and oyster shell must be provided and kept before them all the time.



The first few days ducklings should be fed bread soaked in milk or water, squeezed dry and sprinkled with sand. After two days feed a mash of bran, corn-meal, low grade flour and beef scrap. They must have sand as well as feed, and this must be within their reach all the time.

Remember to provide green stuff of some kind in each feed after they are ten days old. This not only cheapens the feed, but insures good health. We like green cut clover best in summertime. Give all feed in troughs, and fresh water several times a day.

L. H. N.—There are many causes for chicks dying in the shell; old, over-fat, or inbred parent stock; an insufficient number of male birds; too much or too little heat or moisture during the period of incubation, etc., etc. If you read the January and March numbers of COMFORT, you will realize how important the two last are when hatching in an incubator. As the chicks you hatched last year commenced to pip on the 19th day, and were all out by the twentieth, I imagine you have not cooled the eggs enough, or have allowed the heat to run above 103 degrees. Or you may have made the fatal mistake of opening the incubator door after the eggs commenced to pip, which would allow the moisture to escape and prevent the remaining chicks freeing themselves from the shell. A flock of sixty hens should have all the whole corn or corn and wheat they could eat up clean at night, and about one third less mash in the morning than they would eat in ten minutes. The best way to gauge the mash is to feed all they will eat in ten minutes, and for the future give one third less. When confined to yards, give a quart of small grain scattered in deep litter at noon, and some green vegetable.

A. M. K.—From 25 to 30 eggs a day from forty chickens is very good. You might reduce the amount of scratch in the morning to two quarts, as they have dry mash always before them. It is advisable to give a little green vegetable food, if you possibly can, at noon. Diarrhea may be caused by the bird being able to pick out the animal food in the dry mash, unless it is kept in a well-constructed self-feeder which only allows a small quantity to come within reach at a time. Read answer to L. H. N.

B. B. L.—Oats and bran are wanting in the qualities which make fat. I can't make out the name of the powder you feed twice a week, but good food is much better than tonics and powders. Read answers to L. H. N. and A. M. K.

L. M. L.—March and April COMFORT will have answered the first part of your letter. Feeding and growing stock and the care of pullets will all appear in later numbers in timely order. All the recognized makes of incubators do good work if properly attended to. Study this department in the January and March numbers.

J. B. M.—I can't understand the case. Unless the hen ate something which could not pass into the gizzard, or swallowed some irritating substance like paint skins, lime, Rough on Rats, or some such poisonous matter which has caused inflammation of the crop. The best treatment in such cases is to pour water down the bird's throat; then hold it by the feet, head hanging down, and gently work the crop from the breastbone down to the neck. After getting as much out of the crop as possible, give some soft liquid food. If you know that unslaked lime is likely to have been within the bird's reach, give a dose of weak vinegar and water; if Rough on Rats is suspected, a dose of magnesia. When you have no idea of what may have caused the trouble, pour thick rice or barley water, or thin custard down the bird's throat after the crop has been emptied; but never use oil, as it has a dangerous action on some poisons.

S. B. W.—Chickens on free range don't need charcoal. Feed one pint of scratch food or a mixture of wheat and oats in the morning, and about one and a half of wheat and cracked corn at night, from May until the end of September; after that, regular winter-laying rations, which will be given in the August or September COMFORT. Yes; you can get farmers' bulletins on chicken raising from the government. Address your request to the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. Bulletin No. 287, "Hints to Poultry Raisers;" Bulletin No. 528, will help you, and are distributed free.

M. A. B.—The hen's mouth must have been injured in some way. The only treatment I can suggest is to bathe with an antiseptic wash, and feed on stale bread soaked in milk and squeezed dry. I am sorry you have had such a poor winter, and hope the bright spring days will give you fresh courage and prosperity.

A. A.—Read the first part of the department this month.

J. A. P.—Scales on shanks and feet are caused by a minute parasite. Hold the bird's shanks and feet in warm soapy water for a few minutes and soften the hard scales, then scrape gently with a soft brush and plenty of white soap. Wipe while still moist; rub with carbolic ointment and flour of sulphur and lard mixed. Repeat after a week if necessary. Clean the roosts, and paint with kerosene or sheep dip.

H. E. W.—Read last part of the department this month, about ducks.

C. H.—Your question about guinea fowl is anwered in the first part of this month.

A. B.—The gobbler must certainly have been hurt in some way. All the first litter of eggs will be fertilized by the old gobbler.

W. D.—Read answer to J. B. M.

A. D. H.—I can't give breeders' addresses in this column. Look through the advertisements.

A Subscriber.—A cement floor, has the great advantage of being easily cleaned and disinfected in case of sickness. With the ventilating system you are going to install, such a house as you describe will be much better than the ordinary one story henhouse, and quite as healthy for the birds if the floor is kept covered to a depth of four or five inches with short litter.

F. H.—For scaly legs, see answer to J. A. P., and for feeding, answer to L. H. N. During the winter, hens must have some animal and vegetable food, as well as grain, if they are expected to lay a full quantity of eggs.

F. V. S.—You must look through the advertising columns for Spangled Orpingtons. I don't know of any breeders in your part of the country.

F. W. F.—The house should be ten by twelve or larger.

G. P.—If you will write again, and tell me on what subject you want advice, I shall be glad to help you.

A. P.—I cannot recommend breeders. You will find some addresses in the advertising columns.

L. A. M.—All well-known incubators are good practical machines, so it is not fair to recommend any one special make. The advertisers in COMFORT are all reliable firms.

J. A. J.—Trap nests have been fully described and illustrated in past numbers of COMFORT. We can't spare the space in this column to repeat the instructions.

B. E.—We have no free books on the subject. Write to the Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C., for Farmers' Bulletin No. 791, on turkey raising.

Wrinkles of the Heart

Sent in by "Mother of Three," Sidney, Ohio.

Time is merciless, relentless—neither face nor form doth spare,
Time is ever hurrying onward spite of agonizing prayer,
And the wrinkles of his making come unsought to me and you,
But the face is deeper furrowed if the heart has wrinkles, too.

Often as I saunter slowly through the city great and vast,
As I watch the men and women old and youthful walking past,
Oh, the many wrinkled faces, faded eyes of brown and blue!
And I wonder, as I saunter, if the hearts have wrinkles, too.

Youth is beautiful, alluring, but with age comes deeper thought,
And the heart mature and mellow is with richer insight fraught,
And time's wrinkles bring a beauty if the soul be brave and true,
But old age has lost its glory if the heart has wrinkles, too.

Sorrows come to all, and heartaches; fortune is a fickle god,
Thorns a-plenty 'mong the roses strew the path our feet have trod;
So all honor to the wrinkles when the soul shines steadfast through,
And all pity for the furrows when the heart has wrinkles, too.

Earth's Noblemen

The noblest men I know on earth,
Are men whose hands are brown with toil,
Who, backed by no ancestral graves,
Hew down the woods, and till the soil,
And win thereby a prouder name than follows kings' or warriors' fame.

The working men, whate'er their task,
Who carve the stone or bear the hod,
They bear upon their honest brow,
The royal stamps and seal of God;
And worthier are their drops of sweat
Than diamonds in a coronet.

God bless the noble working men,
Who rear the cities of the plain;
Who dig the mines, who build the ships,
And drive the commerce of the main;
God bless them! for their toiling hands
Have wrought the glory of all lands.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

Add a teaspoon of ginger to doughnuts and they will not soak fat. MRS. T. C. WARE, Whitefield, Maine.

When making gravy mix flour with a little water or milk and let stand for a while. It will not be lumpy then. ANNIE LEWIS, Ager, Cal.

When broiling meat, if the platter on which it is to be served is placed in the dripping pan directly under the meat all the juice will drop into the dish. This method saves every drop of gravy.

Make a paste of flour and water. Roll out thin and entirely cover the ham to be cooked with it and bake in a moderate oven six hours, or until ham is done. When cooked, remove the crust and you will find the ham much sweeter and nicer than when cooked in the usual way.

To cook peas, throw them pods and all into a kettle of boiling water, after washing, and discarding those that are spoiled. When done the pods rise to the surface while the peas stay at the bot-

German Silver Mesh Purse
Given For Four Subscriptions

THIS is the new "Gate Top" mesh purse with a ten-inch wrist chain, made throughout of German Silver, handsome, stylish, and perfectly safe for the carrying of money and other valuables. A slight pull with the forefinger of each hand instantly opens the purse, a gentle pressure with thumb and finger closes it. Our illustration shows the purse closed. When open the top is as large as the bottom, or in other words, two inches in diameter. When closed it leaves an opening only three-fourths of an inch wide over which the brightly polished German silver cover snaps down tightly so that the contents of the purse cannot possibly become lost. This dainty purse is now extremely fashionable so we have purchased a quantity for the benefit of those of our lady and girl readers who like to be up-to-date in these little accessories. You can have one of them free by taking advantage of the following Club Offer. For a club of four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you this handsome and stylish German silver mesh purse free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 7374.

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for Early Summer Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

1715

THE day may again come when the little schoolgirl will cover her pretty frock with a stiffly starched apron of lawn, "crossbar muslin," dotted Swiss or percale, trimmed with lace, embroidery or "Hamburg" edging and tied at the back with a big sash bow; at present all "apron honors" belong to grown ups, and there surely are many apron styles. Some so small and dainty that one marvels how they can be useful. Others big and enveloping and practical, well deserving of the name. Such a model is ever desirable and a valuable addition to any housekeeper's wardrobe.

An apron with long sleeves, with ample fullness and skirt length, cut low in the neck, and belted at the waist, or loose as you like it, is the best dress protector.

But so much for aprons—from this season's array of fashions we are inclined to believe that women will be out of doors as much as indoors. See the lovely sports and beach dresses. The blouses in Middy and shirt-waist style. The new plaited skirts and those for soft pliant materials, gathered at the waist, and so lovely for flouncing and bordered goods.

If you have a sports suit or costume, a few shirt-waists and an extra separate skirt also a simple "little" dress of Georgette crepe, tub silk, shantung or linen, you are well equipped for the coming season.

Pattern Descriptions

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH
Unless Other Price Is Stated.

1715—Ladies' Apron with or without sleeve in either of two lengths and with collar, or with neck edge in square outline. Percale, brilliantine, mohair, sateen, gingham, seersucker, lawn or cambric may be used for this design.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires six and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for a medium size with sleeves; without sleeves, six yards.

1993—Girls' One-piece Dress, with sleeve in either of two lengths. This model is nice for serge, gabardine, velvet, taffeta, linen, percale, galatea, shepherd check and plaid sulting. In brown or blue serge, with a collar of white repp or linen, it will be very pleasing.

Cut in five sizes; four, six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires three and one quarter yards of 44-inch material for an eight-year size.

2023—Girls' Guimpe with sleeve in either of two lengths, and with neck high, or in "V," square, or round outline. This very practical and desirable model is nice for lawn, batiste, crepe and nainsook, also for linen, silk, cashmere, repp, poplin, and flannel.

Cut in five sizes; six, eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires one and seven eighths yard of 36-inch material for a 12-year size.

2033—A Simple Play Dress, with lower edge arranged for romper style. The skirt portion is finished at the lower edge with an extension that buttons over the front to form rompers; this extension, if dress style is desired, may be cut away. Gingham, percale, chambray, galatea, drill, poplin and crepe are nice for this style.

Cut in four sizes; one, two, three and four years. Size four will require two and three eighths yards of 36-inch material.

1979—Ladies' Shirt-waist. This pattern is good for lawn, madras, batiste, serge, poplin, satin, taffeta and flannel.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46-inch bust measure. It requires two and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

2041—Girls' Under-waist and drawers.

Cut in six sizes; two, four, six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires one yard of 36-inch material for the waist, and one and one quarter yard for the drawers, for an eight-year size. Ruffles on drawers will require about two and one half yards of edging, three and one half inches wide.

1881—A Practical Cover-all Apron. Gingham, lawn, percale, alpaca, drill, linen and sateen are all good for this style. The model is made to slip over the head and is closed in front with a lacing through eyelets.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires five and three eighths yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

2024—Ladies' House Dress with sleeve in wrist or elbow length. This design is good for striped seersucker, for checked gingham, repp, poplin, flannelette, linen, drill and other washable fabrics.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires seven yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1727—A Smart Suit for the Little Boy. This style is fine for galatea, gingham, percale, drill, linen, linene, serge, repp, corduroy or velvet. The sleeve may be finished in wrist or short length.

Cut in four sizes; two, three, four and five years. It requires two and five eighths yards of 44-inch material for a four-year size.

1977—A Smart and Practical Ladies' Apron. This style is especially nice for gingham, percale, alpaca and brilliantine. The front is cut in panel shape, to form deep pocket sections over the side fronts.

Cut in four sizes; 34, 38, 42 and 46-inch bust measure. It requires seven and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a 38-inch size.

1822—Ladies' House or Porch Dress. Linen, drill, linene, corduroy, gabardine, serge, taffeta, percale, seersucker, and brilliantine, are also nice for this model. The skirt is a three-piece model. The sleeve may be in wrist or elbow length.

Cut in seven sizes; 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires five and one half yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1989—Girls' Yoke Dress. This model is good for all wash fabrics, for serge, gabardine, velvet, corduroy, taffeta, albatross and cashmere.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires three yards of 36-inch material for a four-year size.

2029—A Pretty Night Dress in "Slip on Style." Batiste, nainsook, lawn, dimity, crossbar muslin, dotted Swiss, crepe, silk, washable satin, flannel and flannelette are all good for this style.

Cut in four sizes; small, medium, large and extra large. A medium size will require six yards of 36-inch material.

2059—A Charming Negligee. This model is fine for soft crepes, lawns and organdies. It is also nice for challie, silk, batiste and voile.

Cut in four sizes; small, medium, large and extra large. Medium size will require six and one half yards of 36-inch material.

1710—Girls' Apron. Gingham, percale, chambray, lawn, drill, jean, or sateen could be used for this style.

Cut in five sizes; two, four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires two and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a six-year size.

2018—Girls' One-piece Dress, with sleeve in either of two lengths. Serge, mixed suiting, plaid woolen, repp, galatea, gingham, chambray, percale, linen and linene are nice for this model.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires three and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for an eight-year size.

1991—Girls' Dress in over-blouse style, with guimpe. The guimpe may be of crepe, batiste, or lawn. The over-blouse dress is good for cashmere, serge, silk, crepe and satin. The sleeve may be made in kimono style, or finished in wrist length.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires one and three quarters yard of 36-inch material for the guimpe, and three and one half yards for the dress, for a 12-year size.

2035—Waist. 2020—Skirt. A Gown with New Style Features. For the waist one could have pompadour silk and Georgette crepe, while the skirt could be of serge, gabardine, or satin.

Waist 2035 cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. Skirt 2020, cut in seven sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, 32 and 34 inches waist measure. The skirt requires four yards of 44-inch material for a 24-inch size. The waist requires two and one half yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size. Two separate patterns. 10c for each pattern.

2012—Girls' One-piece Yoke Dress, with sleeve in either of two lengths. All wash materials such as linen, chambray, gingham, galatea, crepe and percale are nice for this model. It is also good for plaid and checked suiting, serge and gabardine.

Cut in four sizes; four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires three and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for an eight-year size.

2021—Ladies' Sport Blouse, with sleeve in either of two lengths. This style is fine for satin, taffeta, flannel, batiste, lawn, linen and other wash fabrics.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires three and one half yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1918—Child's Rompers with round collar or square neck outline and with long or short sleeve. Gingham, chambray, drill, galatea, and serge are good for this style. The pattern is composed of a waist and bloomers which may be joined to the waist or buttoned on separately.

Cut in three sizes; two, four and six years. It requires three yards of 36-inch material for a four-year size.

2034—Ladies' Dress, with sleeve in either of two lengths. Lawn, challie, batiste, crepe, foulard, wash silk, marquisette and voile are nice for this style.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires eight yards of material for a 36-inch size.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. It requires three yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1983—Girls' Dress. Blue serge with trimming of blue or black soutache braid would be nice for this model. Plaid or checked suiting, or a combination of either with plain material, is also good.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires four yards of 44-inch material for a 12-year size.

2014—Overblouse Dress for Misses and Small Women. This model is nice for serge, and satin combinations, and good for gabardine and crepe. The overdress may be used to wear with any guimpe or underwaist.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires two yards of 36-inch material for the guimpe and three and five eighths yards for the dress, for a 16-year size.

2015—Girls' One-piece Dress, with sleeve in either of two lengths. Striped galatea in brown and white, with trimming of white pique is here shown. The model has smart pocket trimmings.

Cut in five sizes; six, eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires four and one quarter yards of 44-inch material for a 10-year size.

2016—A New Ladies' Skirt. Broadcloth, serge, satin, foulard, duvetyn, gabardine, linen, corduroy and taffeta are all suitable for this design.

Cut in six sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30 and 32 inches waist measure. It requires four and three quarters yards of 44-inch material for a 24-inch size.

COMFORT'S New Tatting Book

Premium No. 8031.

Handsomely Illustrated With Over Half a Hundred of the Newest Prettiest Designs With Full Directions for Working.

THIS is COMFORT'S own tatting book—published by COMFORT—every design in it by a COMFORT worker—beautifully illustrated and containing full working directions as well as explaining by word and picture just how tatting is done—the various positions of the hands and the different movements used in making the stitches. These instructions are so plain, simple and easily understood that the beginner can readily master them and soon become an expert worker. There are sixty-one illustrations in all and the designs range from the simplest edgings and insertions to the handsome designs worked with two threads. Included among them are ring, star, shamrock, pointed, half wheel, and whole wheel edgings; clover leaf beadings, edgings and insertions; two color insertions, two thread beadings, clover leaf scallop, round medallions, boudoir cap, doily, pointed medallion, trimmed waist, collar corners, medallion trimmed corset cover, tatting applique, and tatted silk bonnets, net collar with tatting applique, medallion edged centerpiece, pillow covers, primrose hand bag, chemise or nightgown yoke, Vandyke point sideboard cover and dresser scarfs. Each design is illustrated by a fine, large photograph of the finished work which shows every thread and stitch so plainly that directions seem hardly necessary—one could almost make the various pretty things going by the pictures alone.

Remember that this book is totally unlike any other tatting book ever sold or offered as a premium—the designs being the work of COMFORT's own subscribers are of course different from all others and—as we think—much prettier than any ever yet published. While most tatting books show only about fifteen or twenty designs and ordinary ones at that, this new book contains fifty-six, all different, beautifully illustrated by genuine photographs, with full working directions as well as a whole page of instructions on how to do tatting—instructions that should enable any inexperienced woman or girl to become an expert worker after a very few trials.

We will send you this tatting book free if you will accept either one of the following special offers:

5 Feet Long

3 Feet Wide, Guaranteed Fast Colors,

Complete With Pole, Halyard And Holder

Sent Prepaid For A Club Of 8

NOW is the time for every good American to show his patriotism by displaying the Stars and Stripes—the most beautiful flag in the world. Let "Old Glory" wave over your home—especially on Memorial Day, Fourth of July, Flag Day, Washington's and Lincoln's Birthdays, as well as on such local events as G. A. R. Reunions, Conventions, Home Coming Weeks, etc. We know that there are no more patriotic, home-loving Americans anywhere than COMFORT'S own subscribers, so we are going to offer this handsome flag, all ready to fling to the breeze as soon as you receive it. The outfit consists of the flag, halyard, polished hardwood pole and iron socket or "holder." The flag is 3 x 5 feet in size, made of special fast color material positively guaranteed not to fade or run, with sewed stripes and printed stars, full canvas head and brass grommets. The pole is seven feet long and made in two parts for convenience in shipping, being joined together with a solid metal screw joint that makes the pole absolutely rigid and as strong as if it were all one piece. To complete the outfit we also send you a strong, heavy iron socket for the base of the pole. This holds the pole always in position and it can be screwed down wherever you want it—on porch or piazza roof, the sill of some upstairs window or anywhere else around the house.

Please remember that we absolutely guarantee this flag to be fast colors. Neither sun, snow nor rain can affect it.

We will send you this fine American Flag with outfit complete as described above on the terms of the following special

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any question privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing as above.

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

SLIMY MILK.—I have a cow, thirteen years old. She freshened January fourth. Since then, when the milk is separated there is left in the separator bowl what looks like cream, but more sticky. There are no lumps left in the strainer, like garget and her udder is not caked. What ails her and is her milk fit to use? MRS. J. C. K.

A.—Keep a separate sample of milk from each quarter to see if one is affected or are all. In such case an attack of garget may be the cause and if so such milk would be unfit for use. It is more likely however, that bacteria in the milk utensils causes the trouble and you should be very careful to sterilize the vessels by cleansing, scalding and sun drying.

SWELLING.—I have a horse eight years old that had blood poisoning, about four years ago, in the pastern joint of the right front foot. It swelled up and the swelling never went away. It does not hurt him any. I work him every day. At night it grows larger. R. A. G.

A.—Hand rub the swollen part each time the horse comes into the stable and then wrap it with cotton batting and bandage snugly with a flannel bandage over the cotton. This will help if you persist in the treatment.

CRIBBING.—I have been a reader of COMFORT for many years and like the information I get from its columns. Please inform me what to do for a horse that is a crib biter. D. M. S.

A.—The vice is incurable when confirmed. Buckle a wide strap fairly tight around the neck just back of the throat latch. Stable the horse in a box stall containing nothing upon which the teeth could be set or the chin rested to practise the habit.

SELF-SUCKING COW.—I have a four-year-old cow that sucks herself. Will you advise me what to do? T. S.

A.—The habit cannot as a rule be cured, but may be stopped by putting a bull ring in the nose and linking two extra rings in the first one, or by putting a necklace of sharpened pickets upon the neck with the pickets running lengthwise.

LAMENESS.—My horse, six years old, has suddenly gone lame in his left fore foot. It is swollen some between the hoof and ankle. I bathe in hot water and put liniment on the ankle. He is in good condition in every other way. Am not working him and have had the shoe taken off of that foot. Am a subscriber to COMFORT and could not do without it. J. B. M.

A.—The location of the swelling suggests ringbone, but without an examination we cannot determine if that is present or the cause of lameness. If you cannot employ a qualified veterinarian clip the hair from the hoof-head and pastern and apply a blister.

WORMS.—My mare, five years old this spring, has large, round stomach worms, large in the middle and pointed at the ends. What will remove them? A. L. O.

A.—These round worms are known as ascaris megalaceptala and may be destroyed by mixing in the feed night and morning for a week one tablespoonful of a mixture of equal quantities by weight of powdered copperas, salt and sulphur; then skip ten days and repeat. Omit copperas for a pregnant mare and increase salt and sulphur.

PARALYSIS.—I lost a young heifer about two years old. She got her horns hung in a crack in the stall and lay in a cramped position all night, or a good part of the night. When we found her the next morning she seemed numb in her legs and could not stand up. We called a veterinary who said she was hurt internally. J. M.

A.—The cow no doubt broke her neck or so injured her spine and spinal cord as to cause the paralysis described and treatment wouldn't avail in such a case.

RHEUMATISM.—I have a dog two years old that has something wrong with his legs. He seems stiff at times, in his hind legs, and at other times in his front legs. The knee joints swell, and when he gets up he howls. He seems all right after he runs. G. F. B.

A.—The symptoms indicate inflammatory rheumatism. Give five grains of salol every three hours at time of attack. Also bathe joints with alcohol and then swathe in cotton batting and bandage. Keep dog out of cold and wet and give him a warm, dry bed.

STOCKED LEGS.—I have a fast track mare, eight years old whose blood is in bad condition. Her legs stock when she stands in the barn for a day. She hasn't been on pasture for two years. When I drive her four or five miles her legs become their normal size. What would you advise me to do with her. She will have pasture next summer. Would you advise a box stall? Will her legs stop stocking if her blood becomes pure once more? R. R. R.

A.—Allow her a roomy box stall but have her work or take active exercise every day. Each time she comes in rub her legs thoroughly, then wrap with cotton batting and bandage snugly. This alone should prove curative but it would also be well to have her teeth put in order by a veterinarian and then give her the worm powders often prescribed here. The stocking should subside when she regains normal health.

AGE OF FILLY.—How old should a filly be when her first colt is born? M. C.

A.—A filly may be bred at two years old if very well developed, but ordinarily it is best not to breed before three years. The foal is carried eleven months.

RABBITS DYING.—I have a mother rabbit with young. A cat killed the father. I would like to know the cause of my rabbits dying. When they were three weeks old I kept the father with them and in the morning one or two would be dead. Sometimes they get weak, fall over and die. Please tell me what to feed them. T. D.

A.—The buck killed the young rabbits as will always be the case if you give him the chance. The buck should always be kept away when the doe has young. The little rabbits may be fed clover, lettuce, cabbage, oats, bran and roots.

TAIL RUBBING.—I have a six-year-old horse that rubs the roots of his tail and is also rubbing the hair off his neck. When he has rubbed the hair off there are little blue knots with blue hairs growing in them. M. C.

A.—Have the horse clipped and then do not let him stand for a single day without work or exercise. Scrub affected parts clean and when dry pour on and rub in a mixture of one part of kerosene and three of machine oil or cottonseed oil. Repeat every three days. Sulphur may be mixed with the oil if kerosene alone is not effectual.

SWEATING.—I have a mule seven years old. She sweats freely, but does not shed her hair. It is thick and dead looking. R. M. K.

A.—The proper treatment would be to have the mule clipped at once. If you do not care to do that blanket heavily daily and trot her until she sweats, then the hair should loosen and come off quickly adhering to the blanket. Feed flaxseed meal or carrots in addition to grain and hay.

CALLOUS.—My mare hurt her right fore leg above the ankle, injuring the bone. The wound is well and hair is growing over the scar, but it has left a knot on her leg about the size of a walnut and seems to be composed of bone and gristle. Can this be taken off? She does not appear to be lame, but it will ruin the sale of her. M. F. H.

A.—The callous or "knot" might be cut out by a veterinarian but it is unlikely that medicinal treatment will help. We should advise leaving it alone.

LAMENESS.—What is good for a four-year-old horse that is strained in coffin joint? Subscriber.

A.—It would be practically impossible to diagnose such an injury but if chronic foot lameness is present a blister applied to the hoof-head after clipping off the hair may do some good. Use a mixture of two drams each of powdered cantharides and biniodide of mercury and three ounces of lard.

HEAVES.—My horse had a long drive about three weeks ago and has had a cough since then. He jerks as though taking the heaves. E. S.

A.—The long drive probably brought on heaves which was not apparent but coming on before. Give him half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic night and morning. Wet all feed. Let him live on grass, without hay, as soon as it is ready.

am, would perhaps be the better way of putting it," said the stranger, with bitter irony. Look here; perhaps this will tell you better than any other form of introduction," she added, almost fiercely, as, with one hand, she snatched the cap off her child's head and then turned his face toward Edith.

The startled girl involuntarily uttered a cry of mingled surprise and dismay, for, in face and form and bearing, she beheld—a miniature Emil Correlli!

For a moment she was speechless, thrilled with greater loathing for the man than she had ever before experienced, as a suspicion of the truth flashed through her brain.

Then she lifted her astonished eyes to the woman, to find her regarding her with a look of mingled curiosity, hatred and triumph.

"The boy is—his child?" Edith murmured at last.

"Yes you see—you understand," she said, at last; "any one would know that Correlli is his father."

"And you——" Edith breathed in a scarcely audible voice, while she began to tremble with a secret hope.

"I am the child's mother—yes," the girl returned, with a look of despair of her dusky orbs.

"Then, of course, you are Emil Correlli's wife," Edith cried; "you have come to tell me this—to tell me that I am free from the hateful tie which I supposed bound me to him? Oh, I thank you! I thank you!"

"You thank me?"

"Yes, a thousand times."

"Ha! and you say the tie that binds you to him is hateful?" whispered the strange woman.

"More hateful than I can express," said Edith.

"And you do not—love him?"

"Love him? Oh, no!"

"Ah, it is I who do not understand now!" exclaimed Edith's visitor, with a look of perplexity.

"Let me tell you," said the young girl, drawing nearer and speaking rapidly. "I was Mrs. Goddard's companion, and quite happy and content with my work until he—her villainous brother—came. Ah, perhaps I shall wound you if I say more," she interposed, and breaking off suddenly, as she saw her companion wince.

"No, no; go on," commanded her guest, imperatively.

"Well, Monsieur Correlli began to make love to me and to persecute me with his attentions soon after he came here. He proposed marriage to me some weeks ago, and I refused to listen to him——"

"You refused him!"

"Why, yes, certainly; I did not love him; I would not marry any one whom I could not love," Edith replied, with a little scornful curl of her lips at the astonished interruption, which had betrayed that her guest thought no girl could be indifferent to the charms of the man whom she so adored.

"He was offended," Edith resumed, "and insisted that he would not take my refusal as final. When I finally convinced him that I meant what I had said, he and his sister plotted together to accomplish their object, and make me his wife by strategy. Madam planned a winter frolic at her country residence; she wrote the play of which you have an account in that paper; she chose her characters and it was rehearsed to perfection. At the last moment, on the evening of its presentation before her friends, she removed the two principal characters—telling me that they had been called home by a telegram—and substituted her brother and me in their places. She did not even tell me who was to take the gentleman's place—she simply said a friend; it was all done so hurriedly there was no time, apparently, for explanations. And then—oh! it is too horrible to think of!" interposed Edith, bringing her hands together with a despairing gesture, "she had that ordained minister come on the stage and legally marry us. From beginning to end it was all a fraud."

"Stop girl! and swear that you are telling me the truth!" cried her strange companion.

"Oh, I would give the world if it were not true!" Edith exclaimed,—"if the last scene in that drama had never been enacted, or if I could have been warned in time of the treachery of which I was being made the victim!"

"Suppose you had been warned!" demanded her guest, clutching her arm with painful force, "would you have dared refuse to do their bidding?"

"Would I have dared refuse?" exclaimed Edith, drawing herself haughtily erect. "No power on earth could have made me marry that man."

"I don't know! I don't know! He is rich, handsome, talented," muttered the other. "Will you swear that it was fraud—that you did not know you were being married to him? Do not try to lie to me," she went on, warningly. "I came here this afternoon with a heart full of bitter hatred toward you; in my soul I believe I was almost a murderess. But—if you also are the victim of a bad man's perfidy, then we have a common cause."

"I have told you only the truth," responded Edith, gravely. "Monsieur Correlli was utterly repulsive to me, and I never could have consented to marry him, under any circumstances. I know he is considered handsome—I know he is rich and talented; but all that would be no temptation to me—I could never sell myself for fortune or position. I am very sorry if you have been made unhappy because of me," she went on gently; "but I have not willfully wronged you in any way. And if you have come here to tell me that you are Monsieur Correlli's wife, you have saved me from a fate I abhorred—and I shall be—I am free! and I shall bless you as long as I live!"

Tunneling to School

In the northwestern part of the state of Washington there is a little town called Tyee that has the queerest road to school in all the world. It is a very snowy region and also very hilly and frequently large drifts will pile up to a height of thirty or forty feet. Obviously, no boy could tramp through soft snow of that depth, even though he did have a pair of hip boots on, so the city officials constructed a wooden tunnel connecting the homes of the nine pupils with the tiny school. No matter how hard it snows or blows, they can go in peace and comfort to the institution of learning and no lad can stay away and then give as an excuse that his mother kept him home because it was too stormy. It is true there is not much chance for indulging in the time-honored sport of snowballing but perhaps some future administration will take care of that deficiency. Sometimes, when the town is snowbound and the houses literally buried, the tunnels are used, by citizens, as a means of communication.

The Doings of The Dapperlings

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1917, by Lena B. Ellingwood.
(All rights reserved.)

EXPLANATORY.—This story tells the strange things that happen to five-year-old Simmie-Sammie Smith and his sister Pittysing, nearly two years older, through the sly pranks of Nattie, the "Smallest Dapperling of All." The Dapperlings are kind-hearted, gay little elflike beings who ride on rabbits and never let themselves be seen by human eyes because of their belief that, if seen, it would bring some terrible calamity upon them. For this reason their queer little houses are always built into the hillside, and are so made, with doors and windows in front and grass growing on the backs, that they can be turned around to face out when the Dapperlings are by themselves; but as soon as anybody comes in sight the houses are whirled around so that only the grass-covered backs are seen and, as these look like the rest of the hill, you would never know the houses were there. They also have an underground assembly hall with an opening in the top covered with moss and concealed in a clump of thistles.

CHAPTER VIII.

BLUEBERRIES.

PITTYSING and Simmie-Sammie were going blueberrying, up beyond the Pine Tree on the Hill. You remember they couldn't go farther north than this tree unless their mother said they might. But now, blueberries were ripe, and she had told them they might go after some if they would be very careful not to get lost.

"If you get enough berries, I'll make them into a pie," she promised.

"We'll get enough for 'leven-two pies! What you s'pect?" asked Simmie-Sammie.

"Oh, mamma!" said Pittysing. "Prob'ly you don't know how thick the berries are up there. We plan to get you all you want, and then sell some. Why, I'm going to take the five-quart pail, and Simmie-Sammie's going to take the two-quart one. And we'll both take pint dippers to pick in."

Their mother laughed, but said they might if they liked, and kissed them both good-by.

"I'll ring the big bell when it's dinner-time if you're not home before then," she told them.

They started off happily, the pint dippers rattling in the tin pails as they skipped along.

They were not the first ones to reach the blueberry bushes, though they didn't see anyone else. The Dapperlings were there, having a merry time, pelting each other with the berries, and filling their little baskets.

"Hide, hide! the children are coming," called Skippywink, who had been sitting on the fence, keeping watch. "They're coming for berries, for they have pails. We'll have some fun with them!"

"We'll set our pails right down here by the fence," Pittysing said, "where we'll be sure not to lose them. Just LOOK at those berries over there! Thick as spatter! Let's see who'll get their dipper full first, Simmie-Sammie."

Pittysing worked fast, and was not long in filling her dipper with the pretty blue balls.

"Such a lot," she thought with pride. But when she poured them into the five-quart pail, they didn't seem like so many.

She looked around for Simmie-Sammie, and found him lying on his stomach with his feet in the air, and an empty dipper before him.

"Why haven't you been picking berries?" she demanded.

Simmie-Sammie jumped up and showed a face with suspicious blue streaks around the mouth.

"I did," he said, "a whole lot of 'em—but I spilled 'em."

"Oh—you did? That was too bad. I'll help you pick 'em up. Where are they?" And she began looking on the ground.

"I—I spilled 'em down my neck—through my mouth!"

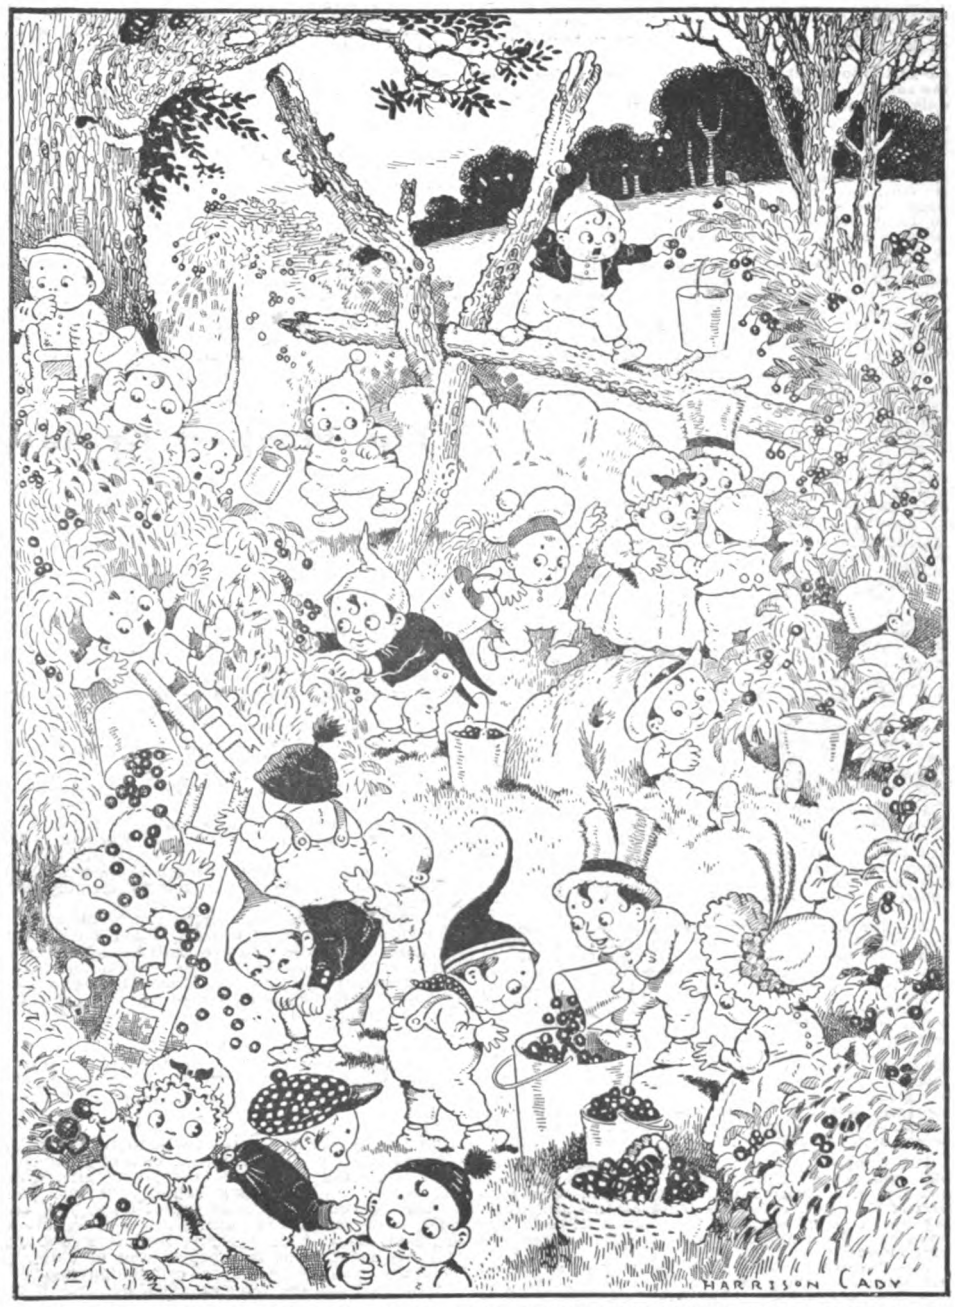
"Well, there! I didn't s'pose you'd be such a piggy! And you know we want to sell some and buy that little set of garden tools at the store. If I buy 'em alone, I shall use 'em alone! But then, you're only just a baby!" she added, with fine scorn.

"I ain't a baby! You'll see! I'm a-goin' to pick my whole pail full in a minute—quicker'n YOU could do it!"

"Come on, then, and if I get my dipper full first, I'll help you fill yours before we empty them."

When the children's backs were turned, the Smallest Dapperling of All came out from behind a bush with her little basket heaped with blueberries, and running to Pittysing's pail, turned her berries into it. Then Zipzang did the same, and Skippywink turned his into Simmie-Sammie's pail.

"If that's what you call having fun," scoffed Niddy-Nod, "all right, but I shan't help. I'll have a nap instead." So he curled himself up in one end of a hollow log, and went to sleep.



The other Dapperlings worked away with a will, keeping out of the children's sight, though they almost got caught. Why, Nattie had to stand behind the fence post by the children's pails, and hold her skirts tight around her, to keep from being seen, when the children came to empty their dippers.

"Thought you didn't have any berries in your pail!" Pittysing exclaimed.

"I didn't!" Simmie-Sammie answered.

"But they're here!" They certainly were. Real berries, as Pittysing found by picking some up in her hand.

The two children looked at each other with puzzled faces.

AFTER THE CHILDREN HAD GONE HOME. THE DAPPERLINGS PICKED SOME BERRIES FOR THEMSELVES.

Skippywink, watching them from a little bush near by, felt a laugh coming, and tried to hold it back by pressing both hands over his mouth. But the laugh wouldn't be kept back; it burst out, and the children heard it.

"What was that?" they both asked, speaking together. And they looked more puzzled than ever.

" 'Twas somebody a-laughing'," said Simmie-Sammie, "and there ain't nobody to laugh. Guess I'll go home."

"Aw, come along and pick some more berries! Who's afraid? Just think how much you like blueberry pies! And maybe mamma'll make us some turnovers. Won't that be nice?"

So Simmie-Sammie went back to pick some more berries, but he kept pretty close to his sister.

With two children and nobody knows how many Dapperlings hard at work, the berries piled up fast.

It was exciting work. The children didn't understand it.

Pittysing measured the distance from the top of the berries to the top of the pail with a little stick. Then, when she came back next time with her dipper full, she measured again, before turning her berries in, and there were certainly more berries than before.

"Tell you what it is," she said, "I b'lieve the sunshine makes 'em keep right on growing after they're picked, same's it does while they're on the bushes. You wouldn't think so, but it must."

"MAYBE there's some 'east in 'em!" Simmie-Sammie guessed.

"What you mean?"

"Why, you know—'east cake, like what mamma puts into her dough—makes it wise up bigger, till it's weddy to bake into bwead."

It was fun for the Dapperlings. They were kind-hearted little people, and liked to help.

The children never thought of being hungry, and were surprised when they heard the big dinner-bell ring out its loud "Ding-dong! Ding-dong!"

"Oh, we can't go just yet! Your pail's all full, and it'll only take a few minutes to finish filling mine. Pick FAST, Simmie-Sammie."

"Tell you what I'm a-goin' to do, Pittsy," said Simmie-Sammie, "I'm goin' to bwing a pail up here, an' leave it, an' see if it won't fill up its own self, all alone."

Both pails were full, heaping, so the berries almost rolled off, when the dinner-bell rang again. The children started for home, but the big pail was almost more than Pittysing could manage. She carried it a few steps, and then had to set it down to rest. They didn't get along very fast that way, and were not half way home when their father came out to meet them, thinking they might not have heard the bell.

Oh, but their mother and father were astonished at the quantity of berries they had!

"However could you pick so many? asked their mother admiringly, putting an arm around each of them.

"Pittsy thought 'twas the bwight sun maked 'em gwow, but I told her maybe 'twas 'east cakes. But I guess, after all, 'twas just 'cause we was SO smart!" Simmie-Sammie boasted.

"Now we're going to sell some, and buy that little set of garden tools," Pittysing said.

"Let mamma keep the berries, papa told them, "and I'll buy two sets of garden tools, one for each of you."

"And I'll make you some blueberry turnovers," mamma promised.

After the children had gone home, the Dapperlings picked some berries for themselves, singing as they worked,

"Oh, the Dap-Dapperling—the Dapperling-ling!
He may be, perhaps is a queer little thing!
But he likes to be helpful, and friendly, and true,
And what better thing might a BIG body do?"

Niddy-Nod, in the hollow log, kept on sleeping. The others all went home. When he woke, it was dark night.

Far overhead the stars were shining, bright little pin-points of gold. Somewhere near by, a whippoorwill was calling, over and over, "Whip poor will!" While a big-eyed owl, pretended not to understand, kept asking dismally, "Who? who? who?"

"Pretty good bed here, and plenty of nice, fresh air," thought Niddy-Nod. "Guess I'll go to sleep again." And he didn't get home until breakfast time next morning.

The Dapperlings get a dreadful scare at a moonlight party. Don't miss it with big colored illustration in June COMFORT.

Comfort's League of Cousins

lessons on the piano and forty-three on the violin; my sister is playing the piano now and Theodore and Irving are dancing.

My sister is eighteen years old and my brother twenty-one. Irving is nineteen years old. He lives in Peoria, too.

Hoping to hear from some of the cousins, I am,
Your loving niece,
VELORA AUDREY CHANDLER.

Thank you Velora, for your chatty letter which throws quite a strong sidelight on life in high "sassiety." My heart gets all torn to bits and all jagged and sore from perusing letters from the sick, poor and unfortunate, and so it was quite a relief to come across a letter from a young lady of wealth. The whole world is ready to share its troubles with you, but it takes mighty good care never to share its joys. I have a few wealthy acquaintances, but I never have had, and never expect to have, a rich friend. There is one redeeming thing about poverty, it keeps people human. If you want to spoil a thoroughly good man or woman, put riches in their way. The man who said that few people could stand prosperity was some wise guy all right. There is another thing to be said about poor people, if they have only a crust most of them are ready to share it with you. One touch of poverty makes the whole world kin, while one touch of wealth too often makes a big part of the world foolish and snobbish. Wealth is a glorious thing however, when people know how to use it, and it's an awful curse when they don't. So, Velora, you get awfully tired of riding on those slow trains in Europe did you? As a matter of fact my dear, the trains in Europe maintain a higher rate of speed than they do in the United States. Over there when they build a railroad, it's a railroad. Over here you can't make people believe they have been riding on a railroad unless they are thrown thirty feet into the air every ten seconds, and find themselves in a ditch with a locomotive on their chest at the end of the journey. I met a lady who had been traveling in Europe and I asked her how she liked the railroads. She poked her nose scornfully in the air and said: "Railroads! Why they don't know anything about railroading. Nothing exciting about traveling over there. I was riding around for six months and never had a single smash up. I was hoping I would get banged about a bit so I could sue some road for damages but they never gave me a chance." You have quite a lot of motors in your family Velora. If Mr. Ford does not mention you and your family in his prayers he is a very ungrateful man. So, Velora, you don't know even how to dress yourself or comb your hair. Well, my dear, we can shake hands on the hair dressing business, for I haven't combed my hair in twenty years, and for a very good reason,—I haven't any to comb. I advise you young lady, to learn how to dress yourself, for if you were staying in a hotel some night and it caught fire and your maid got scared, and didn't wait to dress you, and the fireman was so busy he could not find a barrel, just think what an awful predicament you would be in. Some day, Velora, this is going to be a really, truly, democratic country. There won't be any poor girls to do up rich little girls' hair. Just think, too, if Prince Doodlesocks were waiting in the drawing-room (it is only poor people who have parlors) to see you and Lila had gone on strike and wouldn't do up your hair and you couldn't do it up, whatever would you do? If the prince saw you with your wool all tied in knots, and your mouth full of curling irons and hairpins, he might beat it to the woods and your chance for buying a title might be gone forever. Yes, I like music my dear, but I can't see why you go to the trouble of taking violin and piano lessons. Why not have Lila do it for you? When a certain Chinese Ambassador was attending a ball in Paris, he was asked what he thought of the dancing. He said he supposed it was all right, but there was one thing that stuck in his oriental mind and seemed incomprehensible to him. He simply could not understand why it was that people should go to all that trouble and exertion when they had plenty of servants around to do it for them. Take a tip from me Velora, and when there is any tangoing to be done, get your maid to do it.

ELLENWOOD, GA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a country boy nearly seventeen years old, five feet ten inches tall, large feet and hands, with long slim fingers, brown hair which is brushed back in a pompadour style. My eyes are gray and are separated by a nose which is not small. At present I am attending school and am in the tenth grade. Friday instead of having our usual English lesson we select a subject and write a theme of about five hundred words. The theme is then dicussed and criticized in class. I live on a farm fifteen miles from the capital of Georgia. The farm is south of Atlanta, the state capital. On our farm we have mules to pull the plows, cows to give us milk, butter, chickens and ducks. Also we grow wheat, corn, and oats besides cotton, therefore, we do not have to buy our food for the stock and ourselves.

I can do anything. I suppose that any one else my age can do on the farm except milking, but I can get part of the milk into the pail. But when it comes to working in the field, I can do my part, and in the cooking room, I know how to get up and cook a good meal, and when on the road I know how to drive a horse, or mule, and a Ford auto.

Be sure and come down here about August, and I will let you sit in a cool, shady place by the side of a branch, and see how the farm is managed, and when you were tired of watching you can read.

With love to all, Your nephew,
ABNER PRUETT.

With large hands and an aggressive nose Abner, and keen gray eyes, nature seems to have provided you with most of the essentials for a successful career. Large hands with long, slim fingers, ought to enable you to get more than your share of the pie. Of course I don't want to teach you to be selfish but everyone is considered a failure in this life unless he can reach out and grab more than he is entitled to—the other fellow's share as well as his own. Heart disease is increasing at an alarming rate. Doctors say it is the stress of modern life that is breaking down the cardiac machinery. As usual they are wrong. Hearts are broken because their owners failed to grab everything that was in sight. John D. has stomach trouble, but not heart disease. He got all that he reached for and more too, your share as well as mine. If there is anything he did not get I'd like to know where it is, so I congratulate you on your hands. I am glad to know that your eyes are separated by your nose, as you'd look a queer proposition if, instead of being separated your eyes had become joined together. You would not have much chance dodging automobiles and looking for submarines with one eye. Most farmers need at least

Uncle Charlie's Home Fund

UNCLE CHARLIE reports $339.00, donations and subscriptions, contributed to his Home Fund by 627 persons during the month of March. This brings the total of the fund on April first up to $1,480.00 contributed by 2,175 friends of his.

A subscriber, who is far from being wealthy, writes from North Carolina saying that he is disgusted at the slow growth of the fund and asks me to print his appeal for every friend of Uncle Charlie to contribute 25 cents toward the fund at once so that the home may be bought by the fourth of July. He proved his own generosity by enclosing his check for $5.00—twenty times what he asks others to give. He prefers not to have his name published.

Again let me remind you how you can help:

1. By cash donations.
2. By purchasing Uncle Charlie's books (see advertisement.)
3. Those who cannot spare the money for a cash donation or for purchase of his books can contribute by getting subscriptions to COMFORT in aid of the "Uncle Charlie Benefit Fund" and instead of taking the club premium or cash commission themselves direct that it be credited to the fund. In such cases I will pay over to Uncle Charlie one half of the subscription price of all subscriptions sent for this purpose. The regular cash commission on COMFORT subscriptions is 40 per cent, but for Uncle Charlie's Benefit Fund I will allow 50 per cent. Another way to help him and benefit yourself is to get up a subscription club and take one of his books as your premium.

In one or other of these ways every COMFORT reader who wishes to do so can help swell the fund for Uncle Charlie which has my hearty approval and will have my assistance.

Play Piano In One Hour For One Cent

A Postal Card Brings it to You Free.

Would you give a penny to learn to play the piano or organ in one evening? Impossible? No, not at all. Hundreds of thousands of others who never played before played their first piece in just a few minutes. THEN WHY CAN'T YOU?

John H. Ferguson, Acme, Alta., Canada., says: "I was not a little amazed when I found I could play in a few minutes." C. Pitmann, Memo, Okla., says: "Have two children, one is 12 and the other 10, who in a very few minutes could play it well, and they did not know one note from another in the old music." V. R. Perkins, Romney, Ind., says: "I studied 'Easy Form' music fifteen minutes and then started to play." Thousands of similar reports are in our files. Doesn't this convince you that you can play by this wonderful new method? Any child can now understand and play music without previous knowledge. No teacher. No tedious instructions by mail.

If you can't play the piano or organ, send a postcard today, stating the number of white keys on your instrument and we will mail you 100 pieces of the World's Sweetest Music, regular sheet music size, together with Instructions that will enable you to play any one of the pieces in one evening. If you can play at the end of 5 days you pay only $1.50 and $1.50 a month for 5 months or mail the music back to us and owe nothing. All you need do is simply send your name and address to Easy Method Music Co., 200 Clarkson Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Mrs. A., Vamossa, Okla.—Before proceeding with your invention find out by writing to the Commissioner of Patents, Washington, D. C., to know if there is no one ahead of you. If the field is clear, the real work begins of finding some one to take it up with you and develop and manufacture. There are firms which will take up a good thing, but usually the inventor has to take what they will give and have no further interest in it. In a big thing, the inventor has a better chance. In other words his proposition is too great for him to be ignored, though some of the most important inventions have not brought money to their inventors. The average inventor has a hard row to hoe and we are almost sorry that you have got your mind turned that way.

Pappoose, Comptche, Cal.—Write to Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Washington, D. C., for the Indian word meaning "multiply," but you must state what tribe of Indians, as no two tribes have the same language, though all the tribes are Indians in the general sense.

R. A. P., Kent, Wash.—It is somewhat confusing to locate the compass points of the Panama Canal, as, although it connects the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans, its course is north and south, with Colon at the Atlantic terminus and Panama at the Pacific, and yet Colon is a little to the westward of Panama. However, as the Atlantic is the eastern ocean and the Pacific the western, Colon on the Atlantic side is properly the eastern terminus of the Canal. Get out your map and study the situation.

Mrs. N. E., Washington, Pa.—Tinfoil can be sold if you can get enough of it for a junk dealer to bother with. Small lots at irregular intervals cannot be handled. If you can go with ten or a dozen pounds at a time, you may do some business. Talk to a local junk dealer, or one in Pittsburgh.

S. W. D., Albany, Ky.—Easter is the festival in commemoration of the Resurrection of Christ and is said to have derived its name from the festival of the Anglo-Saxon goddess, Eastre;—Teutonic, Ostara—which the old Saxons celebrated about the same time of the Christian festival. In the second century a dispute arose between the Eastern and Western churches over the proper time for celebrating Easter, the Eastern celebrating on the 14th of the first month, or noon, and the Western on the Sunday after the 14th, the 14th being the date of the Jewish Passover when Christ was crucified. The Council of Nice in 325 A. D. upheld the Western churches and this date has remained, making it a movable feast, Easter falling on the first Sunday after the paschal full moon, that is the full moon happening on or next after the 21st of March, the day on which the sun crosses the equator. By this reckoning Easter, following the forty days of Lent, falls on a Sunday varying from March 21st to April 25th.

Mrs. C., Remer, Minn.—Morally you should have either the land promised or its equivalent in money for the work you did for your father, but legally we can only advise that you consult a lawyer who can familiarize himself with all the details. If you can possibly settle it out of court do so, because the amount at issue is not really enough for all the expense and the bitterness resulting from litigation.

F., Webb City, Mo.—There is a sale for butterflies of various kinds and if you will make inquiries of Fulda, Butterfly Shop, No. 812 Broadway, New York City, you may get information that will be worth something to you before the butterfly season is over. Other COMFORT butterfly chasers take notice.

E. C., Greenwood, Ark.—The usual sized sheet on which stories are written is eight and one half by eleven inches, but the size of the sheet has nothing to do with the quality of the writing and we advise you not to attempt story writing on any sized sheet until you have learned how to write and spell English.

H. A., Jackson, Mo.—Sun dials to be any good at all cannot be made the size of a watch to be carried in the pocket. To get the time by sun dial at all correctly, the dial must be big enough for the sun to shine on and it must be accurately placed by sun measurements requiring more or less mathematical and astronomical skill. Inquire by letter of the Professor of Astronomy at State University, Columbia, for detailed information to give to those who are asking you for pocket sun dials.

Mrs. A. W., De Soto, Mo.—Really, madam, you should read your COMFORT more closely and you would not spend money on postage inquiring for reliable firms who deal in old coins and stamps. Write to our advertisers and not to us for information as we are not experts and they are. Other COMFORT coin inquirers please do likewise.

M. F., Jonesboro, Ark.—The only way to tell a genuine Strad is by remembering that all in existence at present are believed to be known and held carefully by their owners as rare treasures and a Strad cannot possibly come your way. If there should happen to be one anywhere not known, you may be sure it would have no inscription in it. It is strange that after all we have said about these fake violins with great names in them, that you still rather believe the fake inscription than believe us. We are sorry that you so love to be fooled by fakers after your funds. P. S. A genuine Strad is worth about anything that its owner might want for it, say, five thousand dollars or such a matter. Some of the fakes are not bad at all and may be worth anywhere from five dollars to twenty-five dollars.

Ignorance, Fisher, Ark.—Ask your Lutheran friends why they will not dance on certain days of the year, but still do not object to dancing on Sundays. It is not a matter of religion, but church government and observance to hold certain days and seasons aloof from worldly affairs and every denomination has its own especial days and observances. Sunday is a day all Christian churches observe, but no two of them observe it exactly alike and each one believes it does it properly. One reason that there are no denominations recognized in heaven is that if they were, pious people would not be any better there than they are here.

Mrs. Lester Deeds, R. R. 1, Big Rapids, Mich. wants some COMFORT reader to send her an old-fashioned onion like they used to raise onion sets from in grandfather's days. The price of onions is not so high now as it was, so no ulterior motives can be charged against the lady. Besides, Mrs. D. is willing to buy the onions if anybody has any to sell. Write direct to her and not to COMFORT.

Mrs. L. K., Avondale, Mont.—If your horse which you had turned out for exercise wandered over on to your neighbor's farm and there fell into a hole and killed itself, we hardly think you have much of a chance to get damages at law, because your horse had no right on your neighbor's land.

Mrs. Lillie Lockwood, 811 East 7th St., Pittsburgh, Kans., would like to learn from some COMFORT reader living near the Everglades, Florida, how far south of Lake Okeechobee land has been drained and cultivated. Write direct to her.

M. S., Madison, Conn.—You may think you have been reading COMFORT closely, but you have not, for we have more than once announced in this column that a copyright was governmental or legal protection for an author's writings in any form and that copyright might be secured by applying to Librarian of Congress, Copyright Division, Washington, D. C., for the necessary blanks.

Mrs. J. C., San Antonio, Texas.—We are not informed as to dates and ages of the members of families of public men, national or state, and we suggest that you should write direct to such as you want to know about, and if they think the inquiry is perfectly proper they will give you the information direct. Enclose postage for reply, as it is not public or official business.

J. F. M., Minco, Okla.—We suppose the old paper you mention as in your possession and bearing date 1800 is The Ulster County Gazette thousands of copies of which were made from the original and used all over the country as advertising matter. The copy has no value, unless somebody wants to give you a nickel for it. COMFORT readers please make a note of this.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

Mrs. H. F. H., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a widow and children, his widow would receive dower of a one third interest for life in his real estate and a child's part absolutely in his personal property, the balance going in equal shares to his children, the descendants of any deceased child taking the parent's share. We think the husband's children of a former marriage have the same inheritance rights as the husband's children by the surviving widow.

M. M. S., Kansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that neither husband nor wife can, without written consent of the other, bequeath away from the other more than one half of his or her property, we think, however, that this can be done on consent; we think children can be disinherited, by will, in your state.

Mrs. C. B., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a widow and children, his widow, after payment of debts and expenses, would receive one third in value of his real and personal estate, the balance going in equal shares to his children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share.

Mrs. N. B. R., West Virginia.—We do not think that the purchaser of real estate, who fails to record his deed, can enforce his title to the property against a subsequent purchaser, who purchases without notice, and for a valuable consideration; we think, however, that such deed would be good as between the purchaser and his grantor, and that the purchaser would be entitled to damages from his grantor for such resale of the property.

Mrs. E. P. J., Colorado.—We think that the entailing of real estate beyond certain limitations is forbidden by the laws of all the states of the United States.

Mrs. F. V. A., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that a married woman can legally execute a will giving her husband a life estate in all of her property, and that in case he survives her, and receives such an interest in her estate, he could thereafter dispose of same, but he could dispose of no greater interest in the estate than he himself possessed, and the persons entitled under the will to the remainder interest in the estate would be entitled to receive same upon his death. We think there is a Federal inheritance tax affecting net estates above fifty thousand dollars, and in your state we think there is a state inheritance tax affecting net estates above two hundred and fifty dollars, where the property goes to persons other than the parents, husband or wife, children or lineal descendants, stepchildren, adopted children, or the wife or widow of a son.

J. R., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, the widow would receive one half of the real estate and the whole of the personal estate absolutely, the balance of the real estate going to his parents, brothers, sisters or their descendants, depending upon who is left, if no kindred we think the whole of the real estate would go to the surviving widow.

J. V., Wyoming.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that if you can substantiate, by the proper evidence, that undue influence was exercised upon your grandfather in connection with his making his will, you would have a legal right to contest such will.

A Subscriber, Vermont.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a widow and one child as his only heirs at law and next of kin, his widow would be entitled to an allowance as a homestead of a value of five hundred dollars in the dwelling house, outbuildings, and lands used in connection therewith, and such certain allowances from the personal estate as the probate court may allow her not to exceed three hundred dollars, she would also be entitled to dower of a one third interest for life in the balance of the real estate, and one third of the balance of the personal property absolutely, subject to the payment of debts and expenses, the balance of the estate going to the child, regardless of the fact that such child is the child of decedent by a former marriage. We do not think the dower right of the wife can be barred by the husband's will unless some provision for her be made in the will in lieu of dower.

E. M., Oregon.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving husband and ten children, the husband would be entitled to an estate by curtesy in the real estate of a one half interest for life, and one half of her personal estate absolutely, the remainder going in equal shares to the children; we think the estate by curtesy in the real estate cannot be defeated by will, but that the husband's interest in the personal property can be cut off.

CHICAGO TAILORS' ASSOCIATION Dept. 617, 515 So. Franklin Street, Chicago. Send No Money

Mrs. H. B. V., N. C.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion that it would have been wise for you to have crossed out your endorsement on the check you mention before returning same to the maker. It is, however, inconceivable to me that he would be so dishonest as to attempt to show that you used this check. Of course, if he did do this, the issue would then become one of fact and the side presenting the best case would win.

Mrs. C. E. T., Ohio.—We think that if the sister-in-law of the man you mentioned, refused to carry out her agreement with him, made at the time he deeded his interest in the property to her, this man should bring an action against her to compel her to carry out her agreement or return to him his interest in the property.

Mrs. J. S. M., Pittsburg, Pa.—Upon your statements we think that the young ladies you mention can compel the legal representative of their mother's estate to render a court accounting as to the money left them under their mother's will. Of course, in such accounting, such representative of the estate, would be allowed to charge against the minors' estate, such bills as were legally incurred and would receive from such minors' estate, reimbursement for such proper payments as has been made by him in behalf of such infants. Just as to whether this money could be applied toward the support and maintenance of these children would depend upon the terms of the will and if under the terms of this will, the children were not entitled to receive or have applied to their benefit any of this money until they arrive at the age of twenty-one years, we think that such legal representative made a mistake in so applying it except under the order or the judgment of some court of competent jurisdiction.

FARM LIFE, Box 155 SPENCER, IND.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

R. E. H., Eaton Rapids, Mich.—We are not apologizing for anything we may have said about the greenness of eighteen-year-old boys, especially in love matters, which has mildly hurt your feelings. We will print your letter spelled, etc., as you have it, and leave it to COMFORT readers to say whether they want any better testimony for our side. Here it is: "Etiquette Editor: Having read your artical on the advisability of a girl of twenty going with a boy of eighteen I disagree on one point, that is the fact that a boy of eighteen being the greenest thing that grows in a girl's garden. I am eighteen years of age and if I am green I would like to know by what standerds you judge green timber. In this stage of the game if a young man of eighteen is the greenest timber when under heavens name will this ban of a young man's life be lifted from his shoulders. If I am green now will you please tell me when I wall be seasoned enough to be attractive to the girls." We would like to say that the "ban" you mention may be removed in five or six years, though it may take ten; but as to when you will be sufficiently seasoned, the Lord only knows.

Gray Squirrel, Spartansburg, S. C.—You write: "I know that after a lady becomes engaged she should demand a ring." We beg your pardon. What you don't know is the meaning of the word "demand." A demand suggests force and if young men are to be forced to give engagement rings after proposals, then there will be no more proposals. If you have to demand a ring from your young man, now is the time to break the engagement. However, as you don't mean that, we may say to you that if you really love the young man who is working his way through college and is having no easy job of it, you will not make it any harder for him by demanding an engagement ring at present. Is that the only way you can think of to encourage him and help him? Why don't you think about him a little, instead of giving all your thought to yourself? Did you ever try that? No? Then try it.

Greenhorn, Warren, Ark.—Well, well, we didn't know there was a lady in the land who didn't know which finger the engagement ring went on. Try the third finger of the left hand, the one next to the little finger, you know. Left hand, remember, because that is next to the heart.

Two Girls, Floyd, Va.—In a properly regulated correspondence, letters should be answered promptly, that is, within a couple of weeks. If the correspondence is irregular, each writer should wait as long as the other waits before answering. This will end the correspondence if either is writing merely to be writing. (2) The lady may do as she pleases about shaking hands as part of the introduction, but it is more friendly to shake hands.

Kena, Longhours, N. C.—At thirty you have a Biblical chance to live forty years, and if you think this young woman, for whom you have already waited a long time, because she was a good daughter to her aged parents and sacrificed herself for them, is not worth waiting another year for, leaving you thirty-nine years of happiness, then by all means don't waste that precious year by longer waiting. Marry some other woman and see if the thirty-nine years will be what they would have been if you had waited. Take this advice or not, as you please, but you get our blessing with only one woman and you know who she is.

Dot, Ft. Smith, Ark.—The lady may visit at the gentleman's house and take supper with him, if the invitation comes from his mother, as he has no sister, and if he has no mother, his girl cousin could go with her to prevent gossip. Under the circumstances, it might be just as well not to go, but invite him to your house, or both of you take supper at the cousin's house. (2) We have no introduction language in stock. Say whatever you think would be pleasant, most people ordinarily saying: "I am very glad to meet you."

Discontent, Montgomery, Minn.—An eighteen-year-old girl who acts as willful and babyish and regardless of your feelings and rights as this one does will never be any better and the man who gets her for a wife will have trouble all his life. Next time you have a quarrel, tell her frankly that you two are not intended for each other and you are going to quit. Then quit and stay quit, because making up will make things worse than ever. You two are incompatible and now is the time to realize it and go separate ways.

M., St. Anthony, Ida.—You must learn by observation how to entertain young men who call or you are out with. Most girls know this rudimentary principle of social usage and by seeing them you can learn. You can't be told. Your own sense ought to tell you in a general way. Whatever you do, always be the lady. (2) What kind of a car ride do you want to know how to dress for? Street car, trolley car, steam car, motor car? Just for a ride it doesn't make much difference, but if you are going in the car to some entertainment, you must dress to fit the entertainment, whatever it may be.

Doubtful, Grand Rapids, Mich.—If your "steady" is your fiance and he has no objection to your accepting attentions from other gentlemen during his absence, it will be perfectly proper for you to do so. If he is not your fiance, he has no claim and you may do as you please. (2) It may be proper, or it may not, for a nineteen-year-old girl to go with a man of twenty-five, depending entirely upon whether the man is the proper sort of a man for a girl to go with. As a matter of merely etiquette it is proper.

Undecided, Goochland, Va.—Your being divorced gives you a legal right to marry again, and if you marry, we think the old sweetheart would be the first choice without any question. It would be right and romantic to accept him.

Three Chums, Carthage, Miss.—If you had made an engagement with one young man in the absence of another you preferred, and the preference should return, the fact that he was the preference would give you no right to repudiate your engagement with the other. If your promise is good for anything you will keep it, whether you like to or not. (2) The only way to secure the right to stop a young man from going to see another girl is to become engaged to him. You then have the right to object, but whether it will stop the young man or not, remains to be proved. (3) Most girls would rather call an engagement off with a young man, if they knew he wanted to go with another, but there are girls who would hold him to it, merely to spite the other girl. You can take your choice. (4) If a young man takes back a ring he has given a girl and later has a change of heart and wants her to take it again, she may do as she pleases, the rules of etiquette not applying in affairs of the heart.

Mamie, Raleigh, N. C.—Parents may sit up with their daughter when she has a gentleman caller, etiquette in this country not requiring their absence, but if they are sensible they will not. But either father or mother should drop in for a few minutes to speak to the caller in order to know something about the daughter's men friends. Most parents are too neglectful of this courtesy, which is really a precaution. (2) Engaged girls may go with other gentlemen if their fiances do not object.

Mrs. T., Columbia, La.—The proper way for a widow to dress for mourning is as near as may be in the style of other widows in her community. There may be various styles, but in order not to be conspicuous and be talked about, do in Rome as the Romans do. Any good dressmaker in your town will give you particulars.

M. M. B., Ashland, Ohio.—In the absence of an usher, the gentleman should lead the way down an aisle, except in a church where the lady is an attendant and has a pew and the man is a stranger there. (2) The lady, who has been going about with a gentleman for two years, should know better than any etiquette editor on earth what kind of a present to give him. Use your own knowledge. (3) Jewelry is not a proper present for a lady to accept from a gentleman unless she is engaged to him.

out and drank a cup of what it was his habit to characterize as "our modern poison," and took the cover off the hot muffins, but there he paused. He could not, even for the sake of appearances, swallow those indigestibly greasy things! With a careful finger and thumb he consigned two pieces to the fire, set down his teacup, wiped his fingers, and noiselessly departed.

CHAPTER XV.

MR. MAYNE HAS A LITTLE SCHEME.

Once in his own room, Mr. Mayne's face changed. He lighted a cigarette, and sat puffing at it as a man only does when he is mentally out of countenance.

"That woman"—could Lady Satterlee only have heard herself so apostrophized!—"is at the bottom of it all. She is aching to get her very ordinary son married and settled, though I don't know why. The silver affair has evidently not yet been told to either of them. Agatha will, of course, tell the beloved one all about it; the girls always tell everything when they are first engaged, and nothing if they enter that state a second time"—sneering—"but Agatha knows very little to tell. Now, Nerine would be a different matter! And if she told that woman with the dyed hair all she knew, and they put their heads together, they are too clever not to discover some sort of a mare's nest. And I might have some difficulty in destroying it. I am afraid that my younger stepdaughter will have to find other amusement than in visiting Lady Satterlee. It is a pity, for she would have learned a hundred things that the sweet Agatha will never discover."

Mr. Mayne lighted another cigarette. The little scratching sound of the fresh match was very loud in the quiet room. It reminded him of something.

"I don't want her here, with nothing to do but prowl about the house while the other is gone. Her expeditions in here have gone far enough, though I fancy that there is not much my young lady would find of any interest at this time of day. But, till that unfortunate silver is forgotten, I must get rid of her somehow."

He drew his fine eyebrows very close together as he smoked by the glowing fire in the dull gray light of evening. He had something to attend to tomorrow—some short and sharp work to do in the way of intimidation. There must be no more scares as to burglars in Lispenard House till he was well out of it. After that? He threw his cigarette indifferently into the fire, as a knock fell discreetly on his door.

It was Jones who entered, out of livery, and neatly dressed in some of his master's discarded clothes. He stood just inside the door when he had carefully closed it, and looked uncomfortably at his boots.

"Well," said Mayne, sharply, "did you tell her? One more exploit like that and I would send her to Australia?"

"No, sir, I didn't."

"What! Why not?" His voice was very even, but not pleasant to hear. "When I send you on a journey for a purpose, I mean you to accomplish it."

"I couldn't, sir!" For the first time, the man looked up. "She—she wasn't there."

"Not there!" he exclaimed, incredulously.

"There was no one there. The cottage was shut up. I asked at the grocer's in the village, and she'd never been home since the time she was here."

Mr. Mayne never swore before servants, but there was the weight of a dozen execrations in his simple question:

"Do you know where she is?"

"No more than the dead."

Even to the keen eyes bent on him it was evident he was telling the truth; the man was as nonplussed as his master.

"She must have got money somehow to go away. I suppose she's gone to London."

"Shall I go up tomorrow and see, sir?"

"No. I've wasted money enough sending you today. She may go where she likes, as far as I'm concerned. When the funds give out, she'll go back to the cottage. I'll go down myself in a week or so, and make some arrangements."

There was a deadly emphasis in his voice, and the man resented it.

If You Are A Woman Who Loves Crochet And Tatting Here Is A Set Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

ANY ONE of these books alone is a veritable treasure house of the newest, most beautiful designs. The seven books combined form a complete library in which you will find any pattern in crocheting and tatting you could possibly ask for. You will fairly revel in the many handsome designs shown. There are edgings, beadings, insertions and laces for every conceivable use. The illustrations are actual photographs of the finished work and show every thread so plainly that they are almost as good to work from as the directions themselves. The directions are adapted for either beginner or expert. They tell stitch by stitch how each pattern is worked, also the quantity and size of material required and the correct sizes of hooks to be used. Following is a description of each book which is 8 by 10½ inches in size with the exception of Volume I which is 9¼ by 12 inches. Please order by numbers and titles.

Volume 1 contains a beautiful assortment of crocheted yokes for combinations, envelopes, nightgowns, corset covers, etc.—fifteen all different, exquisite patterns superbly illustrated by photographs with complete directions for working including quantity and size of material required, and correct size of hooks to use.

Volume 2 is a real treasure book of handsome crocheted edgings and insertions suitable for handkerchiefs, underwear, dresses and a multitude of other uses,—thirty-three different designs, all illustrated by photographs with full directions including a complete table of all the principal stitches used in crocheting and how to make them.

Volume 3 tells how to crochet Cluny laces. It contains eighteen lovely patterns in Cluny insertions and laces for centerpieces, library scarfs, boudoir caps, corset cover yokes, piano scarfs, curtains, chemises, envelopes or combination suits. Each pattern is illustrated by an actual photograph and the directions for making are full and explicit, including quantity and size of material, and size of hooks required. This book also shows all the principal crochet stitches and tells how to make them.

Volume 4 contains twenty-five handsome patterns in artistic crochet for yokes, boudoir caps, candle shades, baby bonnets, bedspreads, doilies, library scarfs, pillows, centerpieces, portiere medallions, curtains, etc., etc. Complete directions are given for working each and every design, including quantity and size of material and size of hooks required. The illustrations are actual photographs, all the principal crochet stitches are also named and full instructions given for making them.

Volume 5 consists of twenty-five patterns in novelty crochet, including mile-a-minute and clover leaf crocheted yokes, primrose and sunflower yokes; doilies, centerpieces, boudoir caps, unique edges and insertions for serving trays; novelty aprons and collars. Each design is illustrated by an actual photograph and the directions for working include a complete list of all the different crochet stitches, and how to make them.

Volume 6 is devoted entirely to tatting, Maltese and Irish crochet, containing a varied and beautiful assortment of tatted handkerchief edges, edgings, and insertions, tatted yokes, boudoir caps, towel edges, medallions; yokes, breakfast caps, centerpieces, edgings and lace in Maltese crochet and yokes in Irish crochet. The patterns are illustrated by actual photographs and the directions for making include the different stitches in tatting, Maltese and Irish crochet and how to make them, as well as quantity and size of material and size of hooks required.

Volume 7 shows a variety of thirty handsome crocheted designs each one illustrated by a photograph of the real work showing just how the finished pieces look. There are rose, sunflower, periwinkle, and Venetian yokes; boudoir caps, monkey face library scarf and lace pillow; large and small baskets, hat pin holder, jewel box, vanity tray, coin purse, utility bag, star fish doily, pineapple centerpiece; edgings and insertions in pillow lace; daisy edging; spider, bell, rick-rack, novelty and coronation braid laces. Full directions accompany each design including quantity and size of material and size of hooks to be used, also all the principal stitches used in crochet and how to make them.

We advise you to order all seven of these splendid books before the assortment is broken, but if you do not care for the whole library at this time we have arranged the following special offers which give you the privilege of selecting any two or any four of the books as well as all seven of them. When ordering however, be very careful to state the number of each book desired.

Offer 8011A: For one 1-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents we will send you any two books free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention numbers of books wanted.

Offer 8011B: For your own subscription, or renewal or extension of present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all), we will send you any two books free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention numbers of books wanted.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

NOW comes the final month of spring and as the flowers bud and blossom, my dears, so do the summer girls, some of whom I know you are perfectly sure to be, for you wouldn't be girls if you didn't, and I wouldn't think half as well of you if you weren't, but be careful about it and don't forget that the summer girl to be the right kind of a girl must be an all-the-year-round girl. That's the only kind to build homes and happiness on and you are the home-builders and half the happiness-makers at least. Now as there is a great big pile of letters to answer, I'll stop talking and get to work. Here's June joy to you all when next month comes around.

The first letter is from Girlie, Hope, N. M., and she loves and is loved by a divorced man whom her father does not like and she says the young man had a fight in her defense the other day and her father never did and she wants to know if she should quit her father and marry the man who will stand up for her. That sounds romantic, doesn't it? Still, as she is only eighteen, I think if she's wise she will wait until she is twenty-one. But I don't think she will be wise. Most girls need marriage to bring them wisdom and then they are sorry.

Anxious, Athens, Ga.—Why do you want to marry "an awful rough fellow" who you believe loves another girl better than he does you and is flirting with you? However, if you want that sort of a life companion go ahead and marry him if you can, but never say you hadn't plenty of warning not to.

Troubled, Hope, Kansas.—I don't know, but I think that the best way to get rid of a persistent pest of a young man is to snub him on every occasion, public and private, and let the whole community know it. That will stop anything except a lunatic, and if this one is crazy, the authorities should look after him.

Daisy, Franklin, N. C.—My dear, don't talk to me about "soul mates." If this young man, whom you "love dearer than life," though he has never spoken to you, cares a snap of his finger for you he will come after you and do part of the loving, himself. Otherwise forget him and don't be any sillier than the Lord made you!

Clover Blossom, Spanish Forks, Utah.—Don't tie yourself to any young man, no matter how nice he is, especially if he insists that you must, until you are at least twenty-one. If he wants to wait that long, you doing as you please in the mean time, tell him you will listen to his arguments then, unless there is some other that you like better. Three years is a long time for these very insistent young men to wait and most of them can't stand it. Still, they are willing to have a girl risk a lifetime of it. You wait, my dear, and stay untied.

Dolly, Spokane, Wash.—Being prepared is the call of the hour in patriotism, but in love affairs, don't you think you had better wait until the young man tries to kiss you before getting your negative answer ready? Wait for the inspiration of the moment and tell him straight that you are not the kissing kind.

Worried, Pine Grove, W. Va.—As you are engaged to him and he does not seem to think very much of marrying, or of you, I think, your happiest way out of it is to break the engagement now. Don't wait. Drop him and drop him hard. It won't hurt him much, I fancy. There are lots of young fellows like him, but girls won't learn such things, except by experience.

Jennette, Oneonta, Ala.—No girl should send a young man flowers or promise to marry him until she can spell and write more correctly than you do. Stay on in the high school and show this answer to your teacher.

Old Maid, Phenix, Va.—You write a good letter and show enough intelligence to warrant the conclusion that if you studied stenography and typewriting you would average up higher than most stenographers do. If it becomes necessary for you to make your own living, I advise you to prepare for it. As for the young man, stop worrying over him. He does not worry over you and why should you have all the worry? Better make your own home than marry for one, if you can't love anybody else, except this one particular one, who doesn't love you.

Blue Eyes, Warren, Wis.—You did right not to write to him until he had written. You prove what I always tell you girls, namely, that if a young man cares at all for a girl he will not lose her from any carelessness on his part.

Rosy Morn, Fort Atkinson, Iowa.—Beware, he is fooling thee. You are old enough not to be deceived by a boy like that and his continued indifference ought to be enough to teach you that he doesn't care for you and will finally quit if you don't break the engagement. Can't you see from the kind of a fiance he is what an undesirable husband he would be? If you don't, now is the time to open your eyes and look.

Daisy, E. Palestine, Ohio.—Books not beaus for you, my dear. Your writing is fair, but if your grammar were good would you ask me: "How is my grammar and writing?"

Gray Eyes, Wilson, Kans.—Fourteen-year-old girls should not be writing to young men, but you showed better sense than some older girls, when you stopped corresponding with the young man who wrote gushy, silly love letters to you. Keep to your books and your determination to be a schoolmarm. As to the gushy young man, continue friendly with him, but no more. He'll learn better, by and by.

Gray Eyes, Fremont, Mich.—Society is not for sixteen-year-old girls unless they are through school with full honors of final graduation. Girls who think more of beaus than they do of books, nearly always become frivolous women and frivolous women are not the kind who become good wives and mothers. If they don't marry, they become silly old maids, which is about the limit of unloveliness.

There, dears, all your questions are answered that should be, but, my goodness me, there were a whole lot that I didn't answer simply because they were so silly, or showed signs that the inquirers had not been reading what I have been writing or they would have known without asking. Anyway, I haven't scolded much and you may run along now and play till next time and the good Lord watch over us all. By, by,

COUSIN MARION.

one entire eye to watch the hired man. Many a farmer has gone blind watching and waiting for the hired man to move. The farmers at least in your section, need another good eye to watch the boll weevil walking off with the cotton crop, and another good eye to see that the landlord does not get more than half the crop. How many more eyes he needs to see where his profits have gone after the food speculators, the bankers, the country store merchants, the politicians and other pirates have had a whack at him, I have never been able to figure out. Tell your teacher to have you write at least two hundred and fifty words once a day instead of once a week, on some topic of national interest. Do this and you can cover the whole field of knowledge. If this practise were carried out in every school in the land, we would soon have a nation of intelligent citizens, instead of a vast menagerie of nuts and know nothings. Modern day ignorance is appalling, and the schools are largely responsible for it. Abner, you are a very lucky boy if when milking you can succeed in getting part of the milk into the pail. When I tried the job I always got it in the eye. By the way you have some very wonderful cows on your farm. I've heard of cows that gave milk, and milk that produced butter, but I never yet heard of cows that gave milk, butter, chickens and ducks. A few versatile cows of that description, would be worth several million dollars apiece in these times of food scarcity and threatened famine. I am delighted to know Abner, that you can cook a good meal, as out of about fifteen young ladies we have tried at various times for the position of housekeeper in our unique, inspiring and artistic establishment, we have never discovered but two who even know what a kitchen was built for. Some of them thought that a gas range was a new kind of parlor organ and wanted to play tunes on it. Others thought it was the latest thing in Ford automobiles, while others thought it was just a machine for heating curling irons and frying hair. All this ignorance was due to devoted, foolish mothers who would rather have dropped dead than allowed their queenly daughters (who were all going to make ten thousand dollars a week as movie picture stars, or be secretaries to trust magnates and captains of industry and marry into the Gould and Vanderbilt families) to enter a kitchen and prepare a decent meal. By the way, if there is in all America a bright, healthy, intelligent girl who appreciates intellectual companionship, a lovely home where the laundry is put out and no fires to light, and where she can have all her evenings and a good part of the day for study and recreation, and where there is no bossing and being bossed, oceans of liberty and plenty of money for doing little, she can write to me. All that she is requested to do, is to be able to prepare three simple meals decently, and to keep clean her own and four other rooms. If she drops dead doing that we will pay for her funeral. By the way, mothers of America, have you any windows in your homes? The modern girl does not realize there are any, and if she did realize it she would not clean them, and, by the way, mothers, do modern girls know that a bed should be made at least once a week, or do they sleep in restaurants and cabarets where there are no beds? There are some worth-while mothers and one or two worth-while daughters in existence, but the latter are getting scarcer every minute. Mothers of America, don't make fools of your girls. You are doing it as fast as you know how, and I am the one that knows it.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a one-year subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York, grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Got More Pleasure Out of Uncle Charlie's Poems Than any Other Book!

That is what Mrs. Bjerke, Detroit, Mich., says about Uncle Charlie's Poems, and you'd say more than that if you had a copy in your hands. For eleven years we've been telling you about this gorgeous book of rib-tickling fun, and though we have given you the opportunity to secure this delightful volume that would bring joy and happiness to you and yours only one COMFORT home in fifty contains this delightful book, a book which you can obtain without the outlay of a single cent. If you want to know the real Uncle Charlie, possess pictures of him at his work and know the history of his life get up a club of only four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at twenty-five cents each and secure this exquisitely bound volume which contains the funniest and best recitations for parlor and stage ever written. Best spring medicine in the world. Work for it today.

Uncle Charlie's Songs Sang Themselves Into Her Heart

This is what Mrs. Bjerke of Detroit, Mich. also says about Uncle Charlie's gorgeous song book, which contains twenty-eight of the most delightful songs ever written. Full music for voice and piano. Songs for all occasions—love songs, coon songs, comic songs, sacred songs—all gathered into a superb volume as big as a copy of COMFORT, with an artistic cover on which appear four splendid pictures of Uncle Charlie, equal to photographs. Yours free for a club of only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at twenty-five cents each. Both books free for a club of six. Work for them today!

Congoleum Rug

Premium No. 7206

Given For A Club Of Six!

A YARD and a half long and one yard wide. Water cannot rot it, sun cannot fade it. It lies flat on the floor without nails, tacks or paste and positively will not curl up at the edges. The Congoleum Rug is something new. It is not oil-cloth or Linoleum or made of grass, fiber or fabric—it is not like any other floor covering in the world. It is absolutely waterproof, not affected by heat or cold, neither fades nor rots indoors or out. When you wash the floor or porch you can wash the Congoleum rug at the same time without taking it up. You can leave it outdoors the year round, and it will not rot, fade or get that dingy look that other rugs do after exposure to sun and wear. In doors you can use it on your bathroom, hall, pantry or kitchen floor, under the refrigerator or stove or in any room in the house. No matter where you place it it will outwear a dozen ordinary rugs and give years of service. These rugs come in many different designs and beautiful combinations of colors and we have selected the one illustrated herewith as the most suitable for all-round purposes. It will make an attractive appearance regardless of whether you use it as a porch rug, or in hall, kitchen, pantry or chamber. We are positive that every woman who secures one of these rugs will want more of them at once so we have arranged to supply you with as many as you may need upon the terms of the following Club Offer. For six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you one Congoleum Rug free by express or parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7206.

7 Wheel Chairs in April

410 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The seven April wheel chairs go to the following shut-ins to get them out into the balmy air and spring sunshine. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

Leithor Darter, R. 3, Millsap, Texas, 147; Eugene Catron, Marion, Va., 136; Preston Morgan, Fort Morgan, Colo., 132; William A. Sifford, Greer, Mo., 117; Marvin Cleo Jones, R. 1, Birthright, Texas, 109; Mary Florence Hart, Rich Mountain, Ark., 107; Floid Ledbetter, R. 1, Box 51, Piedmont, Ala., 102.

Leithor Darter, age 16, a cripple from birth and has never walked. He is the youngest of the family and dependent on his parents now advanced in years and poor.

Eugene Catron, age 5, has been sick six months with infantile paralysis and is helpless from his hips down.

Preston Morgan, age 10, is crippled so that he can not walk but gets about the house by crawling on his hands and knees.

William A. Sifford, age 14, crippled from birth and has never walked.

Marvin Cleo Jones, age 11, has no use of left leg and left arm, the result of infantile paralysis when a baby.

Mary Florence Hart, age 6 years, had infantile paralysis at the age of 18 months which left her paralyzed from her hips down.

Floid Ledbetter, age 14, had typhoid fever when two years old which left him with his legs helpless.

Emmett Odell, Saratoga, Texas, in His COMFORT Wheel Chair.

Below is the nice letter of thanks from eleven-year-old Emmett Odell, a bright little fellow with a sunny disposition although he suffers from spinal trouble and has no use of his legs.

Our Wheel-Chair Club is doing a world of good in helping these unfortunates who need, but have not the means to buy, a wheel chair. Give the good work a boost. We have a lot of shut-ins on our waiting list who need your help. We have a large Roll of Honor this month. Why not have your name there next month?

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 25 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Any shut-in who has friends to help him get subscriptions can obtain a wheel chair free. Write me for information.

COMFORT Wheel-Chair a Great Pleasure

SARATOGA, TEXAS.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I received my wheel chair all right and am very much pleased with it. I wish to thank you and all my friends who helped me to get the chair which is a great pleasure to me. Will send you my picture soon. Your little friend,

EMMETT ODELL.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Miss J. P., Dadeville, Ala.—All the discomforts in your stomach and lower intestines, we think, are due to catarrh of the stomach, which results from aggravated dyspepsia. Your condition is such that only a physician who can examine you can prescribe properly, but you may yet restore your health, if you will diet yourself under a doctor's direction and live under his advice and care for six months. Have a talk with a good doctor about yourself and learn as much as you can when you have told him as much as you know about your condition. We recommend this course to other COMFORT patients.

F. A. S., Gold Hill, Nev.—We in the East usually recommend that tuberculosis patients get into the high and dry climate, especially in the pine woods. For your son, already in a high and dry climate, the principal thing is fresh air, good food and rest, as the sanitarium people advised. We advise that you get advice from them as to his treatment at home and follow it. Try nothing in the shape of medicine except upon the prescription of a physician who knows the case. If he could get out into the open, in a warm climate, and less elevation, say, Arizona, and have work enough to keep his mind engaged, might be of great benefit, but do nothing in making changes except on the advice of a physician who knows conditions.

X. Y. Z., Gunter, Texas.—Stomach troubles are of many kinds and they are difficult of diagnosis and often can only be treated with the knife. You cannot afford to have yours guessed at and while you have little pain, still something is wrong and you must have an examination made to know what the wrong is. When that is known, then and not till then, can proper means be taken to remedy it. Within a week we have heard of a man, apparently all right, who thought he had indigestion and doctored himself for it for a year or more. A month ago his stomach hurt him so he sent for a doctor and the doctor within an hour had him in a hospital preparing for an operation for appendicitis. Operating for this, hernia was discovered, and also gall stones and the man would have died from any one of these if he had waited another week. He survived all three operations nicely and is now rapidly recovering. Another case of guessing at what was wrong and giving it self-treatment.

Mrs. J. C., Kremmling, Colo.—Yours is another case of a mother with a baby who shouldn't have it. Why ask a physician two thousand miles away to guess about your baby's ailments when you could get a doctor just around the corner to come in and see it and tell you exactly what was wrong and what to do to remedy it? Babies are not to be treated as you are treating yours if mothers want them to live to maturity and have health. Get information and advice from your local physician. We are inclined to believe that half the ill health of grown-ups is due to the lack of proper treatment during babyhood.

Mrs. T. L., Mt. Auburn, La.—Be sure you have neuralgia of the heart before you begin treatment for it. Many people with indigestion think the sharp shooting pains in the heart, resulting from gas pressure in the stomach, is neuralgia of the heart, which has similar symptoms. Acute indigestion often affects the heart and kills, but it is not neuralgia. Indigestion may be cured, or prevented from becoming fatal, but neuralgia of the heart is practically incurable, though not necessarily fatal. Have a physician examine your heart.

A. L. F., Durand, Wis.—Just what the nature of your throat trouble is, bronchitis, or whatever it may be, can only be determined by a physician who can examine you, but we can guess that if you don't get to a warm, dry climate before long, your lungs will be affected and the T. B. will have you in its clutches. As you are a workingman and a bachelor, it should not be as impossible as you say to get away to Arizona or New Mexico where you can have warm, dry air and steady work if you are a steady man. Medicine can only afford temporary relief where you are, and presently, it can't even do that much.

H. T., Sonoma, Cal.—Thread-worms, or seat-worms, while affecting all ages, are much more stubborn and difficult of eradication in adults and in most cases only careful treatment by a physician will do the work thoroughly and even then it may not be permanent. A preparation of aloes and assafœtida followed by laxative mineral waters may be efficient, or any one of a number of drugs to be swallowed or injected, but these can be administered only by a physician. One thing that the patient can do and must do is to maintain a strict personal cleanliness. Vermifuges good for the ordinary round-worm are of little or no value in treating thread-worms.

J. B., Townsend, Miss.—The best climate for consumptives is one which is dry, whether hot or cold. Mountains are preferable to sea-level, but too much elevation is not good, say, a thousand feet or so for the average lung. The lungs are not strong enough for the thin air of very high places. North Carolina mountains are better than either Florida or Texas. Hard work or too much exercise is to be avoided. Rest is one of the prescriptions in demand. Also good food, but chiefly fresh air, night and day and all you can get of it. Farm by all means to be preferred to the city. See answer in this column to F. A. S.

J. L., Oceana, Wis.—Varicose veins are not uncommon and they are caused by retardation of the circulation, by external pressure (tight garters), swelling of tumors, various other internal disorders and by long standing, or straining of the muscles of the calves of the legs. There are numerous remedies and some of them efficient in relief if not cure, but operation is sometimes necessary, and if your physician advises an operation take his advice. He knows more about it than anyone else.

Mrs. P., Keltys, Texas.—A woman six feet tall, waist, nineteen inches, bust twenty-three, and weighing only ninety pounds can hardly expect to become a heavy weight, but the milk diet we have recommended may add ten pounds. Try two tablespoonfuls of the best condensed milk in a cup of water, cold or hot, every night before going to bed, taking with it a piece of bread or a cracker. In addition you might eat plenty of fat meat, butter, eggs, sugar, potatoes and bread and drink as much water freely. Rest and sleep all you can and take no violent exercise. This diet is not guaranteed not to give you indigestion and you must watch for that, because indigestion is not fattening. You say nothing about your general health, and we take it for granted that your health is normal. Remember also that if you were born to be a thin woman, nothing will fatten you.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

tom. Peas cooked this way have a fine flavor and are sweeter than when cooked by the usual method.

DANDRUFF CURE.—Steep a five-cent package of sage in a quart of hot water for two hours. Strain, when cold add one half pint pure alcohol and one ounce glycerine, shaking well. Rub thoroughly into the scalp once a day. MRS. J. B. SILLIMAN, Patchague, N. Y.

STICKY FLY PAPER. (Requested.)—Mix equal parts of resin and Castor oil, with a dash of sugar to tempt the flies. Stir this over hot water until mixed, then while still a little warm, spread it on good strong paper, leaving a margin for handling.

Goldenrod, Abie, Nebraska.

When white statuary becomes discolored, dissolve some starch in cold water; add to it gradually a sufficient amount of boiling water to make it the right consistency and stir. Paint the statuary with this mixture and leave it on till it is cold. When the starch is removed the dirt comes with it.

MISS ESTELLA KRAUER, Hammondsport, N. Y.

Requests

Mrs. Mintie Bealkin, Bee Log, N. C., would like quilt pieces of all kinds, and cancelled stamps.

Mrs. Bert Tyler, Ashland, R. R. 1, Wis., would like March, June and July, 1916, numbers of the "Illustrated Companion." Also books or other reading matter. Will return postage and books, or some favor in place of same.

Mrs. J. S. Grover, Rockford, Box 6, Mich., would like words of song, "The Chieftain's Daughter, beginning:

"One autumn as twilight was speading
Its pinion of darkness o'er all."

Also song:

"I've been waiting a long time my darling,
For the words that you never will say;
But now all my fond hopes have vanished,
For they say you are going away."

Is there an answer to this song?

Recipe for Worcester Sauce.

Mrs. Wm. L. Bell, Massaponax, Va., would like copy of August 1907 COMFORT.

A sister wants to know about painting an open floor—how to fill the crevices to make it warm and the surface smooth to paint over.

Remedies

COLD AND COUGH.—Boil the inner bark of white cherry with enough sugar to make a syrup. Dose, a tablespoonful three or four times a day.

ANNIE LEWIS, Ager, Cal.

FOR SMOOTH HANDS.—A pint of rosewater, diluted with a tablespoon of glycerine, forms an excellent preservative for the hands, and will keep them smooth and white if applied each time after washing.

WAKEFULNESS.—Sometimes the habit of waking at an unreasonable hour is set up. The best course is to rise, engage in some work, and refrain from sleeping—even when tempted—until the ensuing night. This will break the habit.

LINSEED TEA.—For delicate persons who are weak and anæmic the nourishing qualities of linseed tea will be quite a revelation. It produces flesh, is soothing and laxative and easily digested. If the best seed is cooked until the liquor is the consistency of thin gruel, and a flavoring of sugar and lemon added, it will be found quite palatable.

FANNIE V. TIDD, New York, N. Y.

Missing Relatives and Friends

We shall only require you to get a small club of subscribers to COMFORT for each request printed; so in sending your notice for insertion in the Missing Relatives' column, include a club of three one-year 25-cent subscriptions, or if you are already a paid-in-advance subscriber, send only two one-year 25-cent subscriptions. This amount limits the notice to twenty-two words, making three lines; if longer notice is required, send two additional 25-cent one-year subscriptions yearly for every seven words.

Sent To You Prepaid For A Club Of Eight

WE have in the past made many offers of table ware, but this is the first time we have ever been able to offer a complete set of 26 Pieces in return for such a small club of subscriptions. And please don't think that because we are giving away this set on such liberal terms that it is plated on a brass base and consequently will change color and have that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. This Set which we offer you here is plated on a white metal base therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will not show signs of wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and decorated with the beautiful Daisy design which is now so popular and the blades of the knives and the bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished.

WARRANTED FOR FIVE YEARS

It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have ever offered, in fact we are so sure that it will please and satisfy all who accept this offer we are going to guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this beautiful 26-Piece Daisy Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of eight one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you this 26-Piece Daisy Table Set Free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 6808.

Cactus

There is cactus and cactus, but it is said the presence of these plants was not noted in Europe until after the discovery of America. The early traders who carried on a commercial business took back to Spain, England and other countries such interesting and curious plants as they saw in the New World. Except for a few species, the cacti are strictly indigenous to the Western hemisphere. For the most part they are thorny, but a no less authority than Luther Burbank insists that the "thornless cactus" is no more of a novelty than a "thornless watermelon." But among the larger varieties there were none without spines. No interest was taken in their agricultural or horticultural possibilities. About seventeen years ago Burbank began to experiment in an endeavor to breed out the thorns and these experiments have convinced him that in its original state the cactus had leaves the same as other trees and plants.

In Mexico among the poorer classes the very tender growths of certain varieties of cactus are eaten raw, made into a sort of salad or cooked as may be desired. Other varieties have been used in the preparation of certain compounds in the treatment of disease. Several of the cactus families of the desert yield a fruit that is edible, and many is the desert traveler whose life has been saved by scooping a hollow in the trunk of the prickly tree and drinking the water to be found conserved there. The fruit, aside from being agreeable to the taste, is refreshing and nourishing. In certain parts of Mexico species of the Opuntia, known as tuna, from a considerable part of the diet of the peons. In many places it is grown for the market and finds ready sale among all classes. The inner pulp, which contains the seed, possesses a pleasant flavor and creates the happy sensation of coolness, no matter what the heat of the day may be.

In Texas, Nevada, Arizona and California cattle are fond of the thorny variety and it is said that when the animals hear the roar of the gasoline torch they run toward it just as do chickens when the dinner call is given. The torch is used in burning the spines off the cactus slabs. This operation being performed the forage plant may then be eaten by the cattle without any fear that the dangerously sharp spines will stick to their noses.

Comfort's Comicalities "Jest for Fun"

Backward Lover

It was Easter Eve in leap year, and the young thing, who had been receiving long but somewhat unsatisfactory visits from the very shy young man, decided she might take a chance. Robert had brought her a splendid Easter lily.

"I'll give you a kiss for that lily," she promised, blushingly.

The exchange was duly, not to say happily, made. Robert started hurriedly toward the door.

"Why, where are you going?" asked his girl in surprise.

"To the florists for more lilies," he replied.

Repentant

"Before we were married," said wifie reproachfully, "you used to bring me flowers or candy every time you called, but now"——

"Say no more about it," interrupted hubby. "Nobody regrets it more than I do."—N. Y. World.

The Requirements

Willie came up to his mother with an expression of anxiety on his face. "Ma," he asked, "if a poor, hungry little boy was to come to the back door and ask for something to eat would you give him that piece of pie that was left over from dinner?"

"Yes, Willie, of course I would," said the mother.

Willie's face cleared.

"All right," he said, "just wait a minute till I run round to the back door."—Ladies' Home Journal.

Flyixis

(A story of the tanbark)—Old man Drugg, in his skull cap, sat dozing behind the counter of his shop, outside which a sign read; "Drugg, Druggist, Drugs."

A sporty looking man with a black mustache and a nervous smile and a green suit and an imitation panama and a package of cigarettes entered and inquired, "Have you anything that will make a race horse run faster?"

"I have," said old man Drugg. "Flyixis. My own invention."

"I'll trouble you for some, please."

"No trouble at all—$5 a capsule," said old man Drugg impolitely.

And the stranger bought a capsule and departed.

That same evening he returned, in rather more of a hurry and with his nervous smile even more pronounced.

"Did it work?" asked old man Drugg.

"Did it work!" repeated the sporty one. "My horse kept on going like a streak of buttered lightning in a straight line over the fence. Give me two capsules of that stuff please. I'll have to catch that animal."—Detroit Free Press.

A New York lawyer tells of a man who had been convicted of stealing by a certain "Down East" Judge, well known for his tenderheartedness.

"Have you ever been sentenced to imprisonment?" asked the Judge, not unkindly.

"Never!" exclaimed the prisoner, suddenly, bursting into tears.

"Well, well, don't cry, my man," said his honor, consolingly "you're going to be now."

Court Scene

Judge—"What is your name?"
Swede—"Yon Yonson."
Judge—"Are you married?"
Swede—"Yah."
Judge—"Whom did you marry?"
Swede—"I married a woman."
Judge (with indignation)—"Did you ever hear of anybody marrying anybody else but a woman?"
Swede—"Yah. My sister, she married a man."

The Very Man

Irate business man—"You book agents make me so angry with your confounded nerve and impudence that I cannot find words to express my feelings!"

Agent—"Then I am the very man you want. I am selling dictionaries."—Pickings.

A Practical Profit Sharing Plan

"Spend your money after you have earned it; never before."—Dr. Lyman Abbott.

One of the large Minneapolis flour milling companies early in 1915 gave every one of its 700 employes a check for $25 with instructions to take it to a savings bank and deposit it, the check being valueless otherwise.

The object of these gifts was to foster thrift among the employes. In order that the saving habit, once started by the opening of the account, may be kept up, an additional incentive to save part of their earnings has been made to the company's workers.

This is embodied in a letter which reads in part as follows:

"If you continue in our employ until November 1, 1915, bring your savings bank book to us. We will then give you a check for half the net increase in your bank balance in excess of the original $25.

"In other words, if your bank book shows $45 on deposit November 1, 1915, we will add $10 to your savings. If your book shows $75 on deposit on November 1, 1915, we will add $25 to your savings, etc.

"In no case will the amount paid under the arrangement exceed $25."

One of the remarkable features was that a large number took to the bank, in addition to their gift check, savings that never had been deposited. One man brought $200 and a large number added to the check enough to insure the payment of a $25 check November 1, 1915.

Several of the employes had savings accounts already and merely added the check to their savings. Two hundred and seventy-four opened saving accounts the day the company issued the check.

This is a really practical form of profit sharing as it helps people to help themselves and encourages the formation of a permanent habit of systematic economy.

T. D. MACGREGOR.

Workmen were digging a cellar near Oregon City, Ore., when they struck into a bed of hard clay. This, upon investigation, proved to be the burial place of at least 20 Indians. The skeletons were laid out like a wheel's spokes, with the heads toward the center. Arrow heads found lodged among the bones lead to the belief that the Indians were slain in battle.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Stop the Panicky Buying and Hoarding of Food—It Helps the Speculators to Raise Prices

UNPREPAREDNESS is a characteristic of the American people that costs them dear whenever they are brought face to face with a critical situation which has been obviously ahead of them and should have been provided for long in advance. It is a habit with them and their government to ignore an approaching crisis until it is upon them and then, suddenly awaking from their indifference, to take inconsiderate action in a panicky disregard of consequences.

With the example of Germany and the costly mistakes of England and France before us we have failed to profit by the lesson and have drifted on unconcernedly until sucked into the whirlpool of the world war. And now, in a panicky effort to meet the emergency, the people are resorting to unwise expedients while Congress, quite as frantic, is designing freak legislation on the one hand and delaying sound measures of vital importance and immediate urgency on the other through long discussion and disagreement over minor details. Although, at the present writing, it is more than a month since Congress declared war the government has not been able to take the first step toward raising the proposed new war army because Congress was divided on certain features of the new army bill. And despite the President's proclamation that the food question is the most pressing war problem for us and for our allies, Congress has done nothing in the line of promoting larger production or of conserving our present supply or of protecting the people from extortionate prices by preventing grain and other great food staples from being monopolized for speculative purposes.

Under these conditions it is no wonder that the food panic, which recently started in the large cities, is sweeping the country. For many months food prices had been rising with alarming rapidity and when, after the declaration of war, the government issued its bulletins pointing out the threatened food shortage and urging prevention by strict elimination of waste and by raising as large crops as possible the people were seized with a sudden scare and began buying and hoarding every kind of staple food product in sight. In Chicago the mania become so acute that, despite the deterrent efforts of the authorities and the dealers, the housewives thronged the grocery stores and cleaned out their stocks of flour, sugar and canned goods and even bought them bare of soaps.

This popular movement to forestall the market is unwise because such abnormal and excessive buying produces an artificial shortage in the market that tends to raise prices and play into the hands of the speculators. Mr. Earle, western representative of the American Sugar Refining Company, is reported to have said that "the householders of Minneapolis and the country generally are still engaged in a mad rush of buying sugar and flour with the result they are bidding up prices on themselves." This extraordinary buying and hoarding has reduced stocks and, because of the freight car shortage, has caused a temporary scarcity of sugar in some localities. But that this company expects no shortage of sugar this summer is indicated by the fact that it has recently sold its product under the market. Government and local authorities advise against abnormal buying of food products.

Undoubtedly this advice is sound provided the government will do its part to protect the people from extortionate prices by preventing the cornering or manipulation of the market by speculators. Several bills designed for this purpose are pending in Congress, and some effective measure should be adopted at once; otherwise consumers naturally may deem it prudent to protect themselves by buying in large quantities for future use, and the appeal for them to desist as a patriotic duty is not likely to prove impressive so long as speculative buying and hoarding is unrestricted.

Would Tax the Magazines to Death

THE most colossal piece of asinine stupidity that has engaged the serious attention of Congress is the Ways and Means Comittee's report recommending a war tax on periodical publications at a rate and in such form as would cripple all and put many of the popular magazines out of business. Its designers intended it to produce a large increase of revenue, but it will fail of that purpose because in their recklessness they have made it so large and burdensome that, if adopted, it will kill the goose that is expected to lay the golden eggs. It is in the form of an enormous increase in the second-class (magazine and newspaper) postage rate.

Under the present law, which has been in force more than thirty years, the publishers of magazines and newspapers pay postage at the level rate of a cent a pound for mailing their publications to any part of the United States regardless of distance. The proposition is to raise the rate so that a magazine having a nation-wide circulation, like COMFORT, will pay about four times as much postage as at present. That is bad enough, in fact it would be destructive under present adverse conditions with which publishers have to contend because the war has doubled the price of print paper and largely increased the cost of all other printing materials. But it has a worse feature that is positively wicked in its grossly unfair discrimination against magazines as a class and especially against certain magazines consequent on their location, because the proposed increase in postage rate is not level and uniform throughout the length and breadth of the country but is graded according to distance by adopting the parcel post zone system.

If the Committee's recommendation is adopted the rate will be doubled to two cents a pound in the first, second and third zones, raised four cents in the fourth and fifth zones, to five cents in the sixth and seventh zones, and to six cents in the eighth zone. This means that we should have to raise the subscription price of COMFORT, which we have thus far avoided despite the largely increased cost of production which, during the past year, has driven a number of magazines out of existence and forced most of the others to raise their subscription rates. It also means, according to our present calculation, that we should have to grade the increase in subscription price according to distance, so that subscribers in the distant zones would pay a higher rate than those in the nearer zones. At the proposed new rate postage on twelve copies of COMFORT to a subscriber in the eighth zone would cost us nearly the present subscription price, so that the price in that zone would have to be doubled.

Because the magazines can not possibly stand it this tax will have to be passed on to the people, as explained. It is a tax on information, it taxes the dissemination of knowledge which should be encouraged and fostered as heretofore, by the government, or even subsidized rather than discouraged and impeded by burdensome taxation. And the meanest and inexcusable feature of this proposed tax is that it is so contrived that it will not bear equally on the entire reading public but most heavily on the magazine subscribers in the remote rural sections.

With the government expending millions to promote education it seems the height of folly for it to imperil or even impair the activities of the magazines which constitute one of the most important and effective educational forces in existence. The zone rate feature of this tax discriminates unfairly in favor of the small local papers and against such a magazine as COMFORT which has a large nation-wide circulation with many thousands of subscribers in every zone. And yet it is the influence of the national magazines that is overcoming narrow-minded sectionalism and local prejudices by making the people of all sections acquainted with each other and teaching them to respect and be tolerant of each other's ways of life and opinions, that is inspiring the whole people with a sense of common interest and national unity of purpose.

The magazines will cheerfully bear their fair share of the war taxes, but we sincerely hope that, in its long delayed and now hasty efforts at preparation for war, Congress will not perpetrate the stupendous folly and egregious wrong of inflicting zone rates of second-class postage on the people and their magazines. If you are not in favor of sectional discrimination in postage rates, write your Congressman immediately and urge him to vote against putting the second-class postage rate on the zone basis.

No Grain to Spare for Making Intoxicating Liquor

A STRONG movement is on foot to induce Congress to institute nation-wide prohibition of the liquor traffic as a war measure. No other single piece of legislation could possibly contribute so largely toward winning the war or be so generally helpful of the health, morals and material prosperity of the nation. As there is no possible denial of this proposition, why does not Congress act on it? The influence of the liquor interests is the only answer.

To carry this war on to a successful issue we need to make the most effective use of all the human and material resources of the nation; we require all the man power, all the wealth and all the brains at our command. We can not afford to waste money, time or labor. All must be made usefully productive. Yet our people spend nearly two billions of dollars a year for liquors. This stupendous sum would pay half the annual cost of the war, if saved. But spent for liquor it is worse than wasted because of the crime, sickness, pauperism and misery that it causes besides the resulting inefficiency. Congress proposes to prohibit liquor in the military camps. If under the strict discipline of the camp men cannot be made good soldiers in the presence of liquors how can they be good citizens in civil life surrounded by grog shops?

We are short of laborers in the fields, mines, factories and shipyards and need two million men for the army and navy. The hundred thousand men engaged in the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor are needed in useful employments. Why not banish liquor and force them to do their share of the nation's toil instead of dealing out death and destruction, want and misery? Under the stress of present circumstances the government is calling upon every man, woman and child to do their utmost to help the great cause, and yet it permits this army of liquor men to sap the vitals of the nation when it is in a death grip with a powerful and merciless foreign foe.

With flour approaching twenty dollars a barrel, wheat at three dollars a bushel and other cereals at correspondingly high prices because of a short grain crop that threatens a world famine, surely there is no grain to spare for making intoxicating liquor with which to poison the people. With our government issuing bulletins appealing to the people to save every crust of bread, it will be criminal on the part of Congress if it does not immediately close the distilleries and breweries and prevent them from taking eighty-five million bushels of grain from the mouths of a famishing people to make it into intoxicating drink. Watch your Congressmen—and you who put them there will know what to do with any of them that vote to starve the people in order that drunkenness may abound and the liquor men wax fat and prosper.

Terms Used in Crochet

Ch. st., chain stitch, simply a series of loops or stitches each drawn with the hook through the preceding one; s. c., single crochet, having a loop on hook, insert hook in work as indicated, draw loop through thread over, and draw through both loops; d. c., double crochet, thread over hook, insert hook in work, draw loop through, thread over draw through two loops, thread over, draw through two loops; tr. c., treble crochet, thread over hook twice, then work off as in double crochet, there being three groups of two loops to work off instead of two; h tr., half treble, same as tr. c., only work off two loops, thread over and then through three loops; d. tr., double treble crochet, thread over three times, hook through work, thread over and draw through one loop, giving five on hook, thread over and work off by twos; sl. st., slip stitch, insert hook in work, draw loop through work and loop on hook at the same time; p., picot, a picot is formed on a chain by catching back in the fourth st., or as indicated and working a sl. st. r. st., roll stitch, throw the thread over the needle as many times as indicated, insert hook in the work, thread over, pull through coil or roll, thread over, draw through the one loop on hook. The roll when completed is straight, with a thread the length of roll along its side. The length or size of a roll is regulated by the number of times the thread is thrown over; o., over, thread over hook the number of times indicated; k. st., knot stitch, draw out loop about one quarter inch, catch thread and pull through, then put the hook between the drawn loop and the thread just pulled through, catch the thread, draw through these two stitches to form the knot; blk., block, a st. in each of a given number of sts., preceded and followed by a space; sp., space, a space is formed by making a chain of 3 or 4 sts. and omitting the same number of sts. in preceding row; sk., skip, to miss or omit number of stitches indicated in preceding row; p. c., padding cord; * stars mean that the directions given between them should be repeated as indicated before proceeding.

A Pollyanna Apron

SO often when one is dressed in something light and delicate, company drops in and it becomes necessary to suddenly prepare a little lunch, serve tea or make a pan of fudge, that a dainty yet practical apron really is an essential of every woman's wardrobe.

The Pollyanna or fudge aprons as they are sometimes called, meet just such emergencies in such an attractive way, they bid fair to become a necessity, although they are still somewhat of a novelty.

Such a model as we are pleased to illustrate this month for the benefit of our readers, if copied in general design, we guarantee to be ornamental as well as useful, in fact, almost an addition to any summer girl's dainty costume.

As to material, it is less work to select a nice grade of linen toweling, then the selvedges obviate the need of hemming the sides. From one and three quarters to two yards will be sufficient, as the back of the apron only comes to the waistline and is slightly fulled into a belt which fastenes in front as shown. Round out and finish the neck and the bottom with hems. Then for the touch of color. Most any sort of embroidery is appropriate for an apron of this kind. The ornamental of the one shown in our illustration consists of a most artistic grouping of colors including blues, pinks, lavenders and greens, used in working out a simple design in French knots, with outline stitch for the vines and leaves.

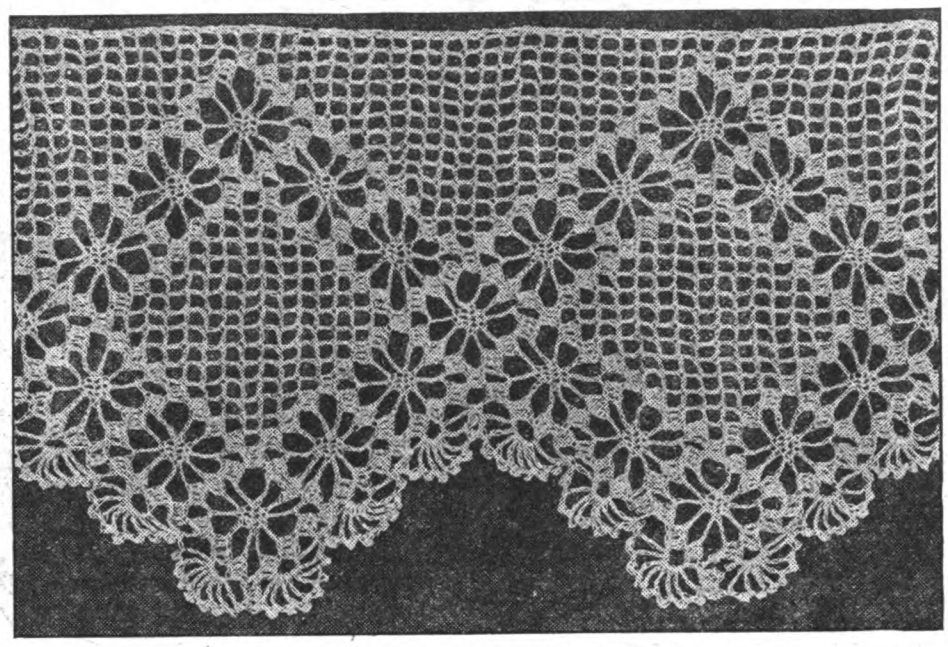
The neck and belt are finished by buttonholing with black. This tends to bring out the light masses of color and make the work distinctive as a whole.

A Crocheted Boudoir Cap

As these dainty caps have evidently come to stay the modern girl wants a variety of styles to choose from, so our second model doubtless will please the miss of the nimble fingers, who just loves to crochet.

A soft mercerized cotton should be selected and steel hook No. 10 or 12.

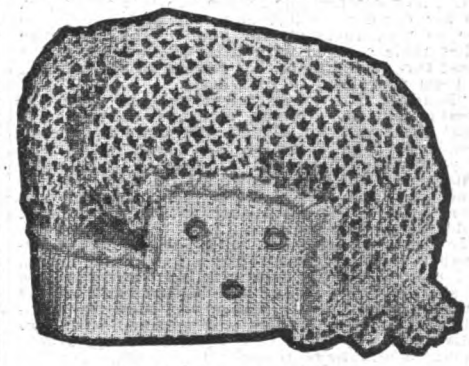


The work is begun in the center with chain (ch.) 6 stitches (st.) join in ring, ch. 3.

1st round.—24 d. c. thread over hook twice, in ring, join by sl. st.

2nd round.—Ch. 12, 1 s. c. in 5th st. d. c., ch. 10, 1 s. c. in next 5th d. c., repeat making 6 chs. 10 in all, join by sl. st. to first ch 12, ch. 2.

3rd round.—1 s. c., 12 d. c., 1 s. c. under each of the chs. of 10, join, sl. st. to 3rd d. c. in 1st group of doubles.



4th round.—Ch. 6, form p. by sl. st. in 2nd ch., ch. 6, form p., ch. 2, 1 s. c. in 7th d. c.

OPEN SQUARE SPIDER WEB LACE.

This makes one picot ch., make another picot ch. in the same way, then 1 s. c. in 10 d. c., 1 p. ch., 1 s. c. in 3rd d. c. in next group of doubles. Continue in this way making 2 p. chs., on each group of doubles and 1 p. ch. between, join last p. ch. between picots in first chain.

5th round.—Ch. 10, * 1 s. c. between picots of next ch., turn and work 12 singles under ch. 10, ch. 3, turn, 1 d. c. on each s. c., 1 p., ch., join to 3rd p. ch. in last round, 2 p. ch., join the 4th p. ch. in last round. Ch. 10, now repeat from * or work over this ch. in the same way as over the first ch. 10.

Repeat making 6 groups of doubles as explained with the p. chs. between, in this round. Join last p. ch. to end d. c. of first group.

6th round.—1 p. ch., 1 s. c. in 7th d. c., 1 p. ch., join to ch. 1 p. ch., join to 3rd d. c. of next group. Repeat, working over each group of doubles in this way.

7th round.—Same as the 5th round.

8th round.—Same as the 6th round.

Continue alternating these two rounds, the only difference being the increased number of picot chains between the groups of doubles. Work in this way until one has completed 13 groups of doubles counting from the center out, then add one or more rows of p. chs. until the cap is sufficiently large. Run an elastic in the 4th row from the edge.

The Priscilla Turnback

This should be made with heavy mercerized crochet cotton and worked with a fine bone hook thus—ch. 23 stitches, turn, 22 singles on ch., ch. 1, turn, 22 s. c., working through both loops of each st. Make 20 more rows in this way. Next row 12 s. c., ch. 1, turn, 12 s. c., 38 more rows of 12 s. c., ch. 9, turn, 22 rows of 22 s. c. Sew the lower edge to the cap and add a frill of narrow lace to the upper edge. Decorate each side with three imperial roses of two shades of pink embroidery silk.

These are very easily worked. Thread a needle with one strand of each of the shades of silk and start with three over and over stitches in the center then take long stitches underneath, from side to side, thus working the silk round and round, building up about the center stitches so that the finished roses stand out.

Open Square Spider Web Lace

Begin with chain 70 stitches.

1st row.—Sk. 7, 4 d. c. in next 4 sts., ch. 6, sk. 5, 1 s. c. in each of next 5, ch. 6, sk. 5, 4 d. c. in next 4, make 13 sps. (ch. 2, sk. 2, d. c. in next, 1 d. c. (making 2 d. c. at end).

2nd row.—Ch. 3, d. c. on d. c., 12 sps., 1 blk., 1 sp., 1 blk. (on last of 4 d. c. and 1st 3 sts. of 6 ch.,) ch. 5, 3 s. c. in center of 5 s. c., ch. 5, 1 blk. (on last of 6 ch. and 1st d. c. following), 1 sp., 1 blk. (on last d. c. and in ch. loop at end,) turn.

3rd row.—Ch. 10, 1 blk. (on 3 sts. of 10 ch. and 1st d. c. following,) ch. 4, 1 tr. c. under 2 ch. between blks., ch. 4, 1 blk. (on last d. c. and on 5 ch.,) ch. 4, 1 tr. c. in center of 3 s. c., ch. 4, 1 blk. (on last of 5 ch. and 1st d. c. following,) * ch. 4, tr. c. under 2 ch., ch. 4, 1 blk., 11 sps., 2 d. c., turn.

4th row.—Ch. 3, d. c. on d. c., 10 sps., * 1 blk., ch. 5, 3 s. c. on last of 4 ch., over tr. c., and in 1st of next 4 ch., ch. 5, 1 blk., ch. 2, sk. tr. c., 1 blk. (on 4 ch. and on 1st d. c. following,) * ch. 5, 3 s. c. as before, ch. 5, sk. 3 d. c., 1 blk. on last d. c. and under ch. loop following, turn.

5th row.—Ch. 10, 1 blk. (the turning is made always, while increasing point, as in 3rd row,) ch. 6, 5 s. c. over 3 s. c. and in ch. on each side, ch. 6, 1 blk. (on d. c., 2 ch. and next d. c.,) * ch. 6, 5 s. c., ch. 6, 1 blk. (sk. 3 d. c.,) 9 sps., 2 d. c., turn.

6th row.—Ch. 3, d. c., 8 sps., 1 blk., 1 sp., 1 blk., ch. 5, 3 s. c., ch. 5, 1 blk., 1 sp., * 1 blk., ch. 5, 3 s. c., ch. 5, 1 blk., 1 sp., 1 blk., turn.

7th row.—Like 3rd row to * then 3 sps., 1 blk., ch. 4, 1 tr. c. in center of s. c., ch. 4, 1 blk., ch. 4, tr. c. in sp., ch. 4, 1 blk., 7 sps., 2 d. c., turn.

8th row.—Ch. 3, d. c., 6 sps., like 4th row from next third s. c., ch. 1, repeat making 1 d. c. in last st., ch. 1, turn.

3rd row.—1 s. c. in each st. in last row, ch. 1, turn.

4th and 5th rows.—Same as the 3rd row.

6th rows.—Same as the 2nd row.

7th, 8th and 9th rows.—Same as the 3rd, 4th and 5th rows.

Repeat last four rows alternately, until work is about 14 inches or long enough to extend from the waistline to back of the neck easily.

Now for front work along the last row for six inches, turn and make four more rows, on 5th row increase by making 2 sts. in last st., increase the same in end of 8th row 9th and 10th rows, then work without increasing until strip is 20 inches long.

Work a similar strip at the other end of the last row of the back, for the opposite front, increasing in the same way.

Finish. Begin at one end of foundation chain and make a row of s. c. all around to opposite end of foundation ch. Then scallop all around in this way 1 s. c., ch. 3, 1 d. c. in next 3rd st., ch. 3, 1 s. c., ch. 3, 1 d. c. Repeat until all edges are completed. Crochet a cord of the wool used double, fasten one end to the lower front corner of one front, finish the other end with small wool ball or tassel, make another cord for the second front.

Crochet covers of single st. for two wooden button molds; when complete sew in center of the back, two inches from the bottom and about three inches apart.

To fasten the jacket in place, cross the fronts over the chest, carrying the cords back, around the buttons and tie in the front.

Summer Shawl of Silk and Wool

For this attractive scarf 8-fold white Germantown wool and pink mercerized cotton or silk should be used. Knit on 1 pair No. 7 needles. A ridge is 2 rows. Cast on 70 stitches of pink and knit 25 ridges.

Join in white wool, do not break the pink, and knit one ridge of wool, then one ridge of pink. Repeat the pink and white ridges until the work from the first row measures one yard. This forms center of scarf. Repeat for the other side finishing the end with 25 ridges all pink. Bind off.

Gather up each end and finish with ribbon loops or pink tassels.

Surplice Sleeveless Jacket

For this style jacket which has a one-piece back and fronts which cross diagonally one will need about the same amount of wool.

Begin with ch. 14 inches long.

1st row.—1 s. c. in each excepting the first st., ch. 3, turn.

2nd row.—3 d. c. in third s. c., ch. 1, 3 d. c. in 1st * to 2nd *, 5 sps., 1 blk., 1 sp., 1 blk., work from 2nd * to end of 4th row.

9th row.—Like 5th row to *, 7 sps., 1 blk., ch. 6, 5 s. c., ch. 6, 1 blk., 5 sps., 2 d. c., turn.

10th row.—Like 6th row to * with 4 instead of 8 sps. at beginning, and 9 sps. instead of 1 at end, work from * to end of row like 6th.

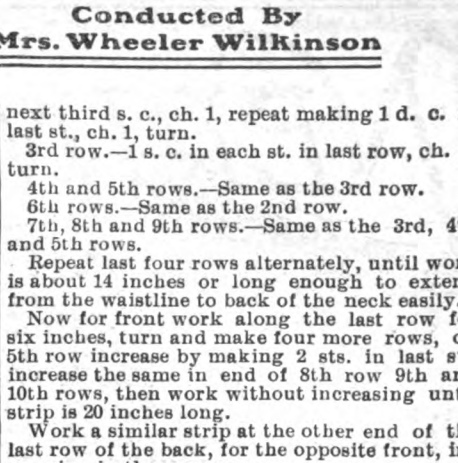
11th row.—Like 3rd to *, 11 sps., 1 blk., ch. 4, tr. c. in center of 3 s. c., ch. 4, 1 blk., ch. 4, tr. c. under 2 ch., ch. 4, 1 blk., 3 sps., 2 d. c. turn.

12th row.—Ch. 3, d. c., 2 sps., like 4th row from 1st to 2nd *, 13 sps., 1 blk., 1 sp., 1 blk., and work from 2nd * in 4th row to end.

13th row.—Ch. 6, 1 blk., ch. 6, 5 s. c., ch. 6, 1 blk., 15 sps., 1 blk., ch. 6, 5 s. c., ch. 6, 1 blk., 1 sp., 2 d. c., turn.

14th row.—Ch. 3, d. c., 2 sps., 1 blk., ch. 5, 3 s. c., ch. 5, 1 blk., 1 sp., 1 blk., 13 sps., 1 blk., 1 sp., 1 blk., ch. 5, 3 s. c., ch. 5, 1 blk., turn. Last block is made of last sts., of 6 ch., and 1st d. c. following. The point is now beginning to decrease.

15th row.—Ch. 4, 1 blk., (on last d. c. of preceding blk. and 1st sts. of 5 ch.,) ch. 4, tr. c. in center of 3 s. c., ch. 4, 1 blk., ch. 4, tr. c. under 2 ch., ch. 4, 1 blk., 11 sps., 1 blk., ch. 4, 1 tr. c. under 2 ch., ch. 4, 1 blk., ch. 4, 1 tr. c. in center of 3 s. c., ch. 4, 1 blk., 3 sps., 2 d. c., turn.



It is not necessary to give further directions for the pattern in detail, as it is so easily copied from the illustration.

For the edge, fasten in under 1st ch. loop, 1 tr. c. under next loop, * ch. 3, 1 s. c. in 3rd. st., 1 tr. c. under same ch. loop, repeat from * 6 times, 1 s. c. under next loop, shell under next loop, and continue in this way, making 3 shells, fastening the 3rd under loop at end of point, ch. 4, s. c. under same loop, then make 3 shells on other side of scallop, fastening with s. c. in ch. loop in depth.

Doily Set of White and Colored Thread

Insert Medallions Fig 1 in centers and edge with tatted rings and points Fig. 2.

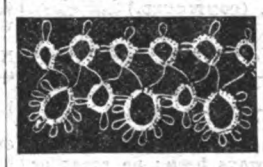
To make medallions cut off piece of coronation braid with 42 divisions and sew ends carefully and smoothly together.

DOILY OF WHITE AND COLORED THREAD FIG. 1.

Now with crochet hook make 2 s. c. over joining, skip 3 divisions, 2 s. c. 3 divisions, 2 s. c., very close together, to form small ring, fasten off.

Arrange as shown and on wrong side, with needle and thread catch divisions together so they will be strong.

Edge of medallion 7 p. rings, join 4th p. of each to either side of a division of the braid with color 5 p., chs. 1 ring, join to opposite side same division, see illustration. Two or more rows of tatting can be added to medallions for center of large doilies.



EDGING. FIG. 2.

Fig. 2 Make 7 p. rings, with spool of color, make 2 p. chs., white point of 2 d. s., 1 p., 2 d. s., continue.

Zagzag Edging

Begin by making one of the upper small rings of 6 d. s., 1 p., 6 d. s., 1 p. 6 d. s., 1 p., 6 d. s., close, leave thread about one quarter inch, and make the large picot ring of 4 d. s., 1 p., *, 2 d. s., 1 p., repeat 6 times, 4 d. s., close.

ZIGZAG EDGING.

Second small ring and join to first. Make third ring in the same way, only join to large picot ring. Repeat from the beginning

Tatting Book Notice

In response to the demand and for the benefit of our readers who are interested in tatting, we have issued a 16-page booklet of special designs by COMFORT workers.

This Tatting Book illustrates very plainly just how the work is to be done, by showing the various position of the worker's hands, which are accompanied by explicit directions for the different movements used in making the stitch.

It also contains a complete range of patterns from the simplest edgings and insertions to handsome designs worked with one and two threrds, including patterns for doilies, centerpieces, scarfs, lingerie, waists, yokes, collars, infants' and boudoir caps, bags, etc.

We will send a copy of this book free for one new yearly subscription (not your own) at 25c., or for your own subscription or renewal and ten cents extra 35c in all. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NERINE'S SECOND CHOICE

by Adelaide Stirling

Copyright 1897 and 1899, by Street and Smith.
Serial rights by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Lispenard, cousin to Kit Belton's mother, marries a Canadian girl. Dying he leaves a widow, two girls, Agatha and Nerine, and one son Maurice. Mrs. Lispenard marries Clarence Mayne, an interloper. At her decease she leaves Clarence Mayne an income until the girls are of age. Lispenard house and money go to the male heir in the direct line. Clarence Mayne goes on a trip to Monte Carlo, Kit Belton comes on a visit, while Maurice Lispenard, denied the education which is his by right, walks from Liverpool, where he is learning to be a mechanical engineer, to be with Kit Belton. Jones, known to Maurice as Lister, is ordered to harness the horses, when they go to see Lord Satterlee in a game of football. Agatha recognizes him. He has attended St. Jude's that he might see her. Maurice invites Lord Satterlee to dine with him. A young maid, not familiar with the house, and suspicious, leaves him in the darkness. He gropes his way to Clarence Mayne's room, where Nerine finds him later. She picks up a fallen table. In a secret drawer she discovers a book with her mother's initials on it. Nerine and Agatha going for a walk meet Lord Satterlee who hopes to see them at the next dance. Returning to Mr. Mayne's rooms the next day Nerine discovers that they are occupied during his absence and detects a strange woman putting the Lispenard silver in a strong bag. Left alone Nerine substitutes stones and minerals and covers them with her silk skirt. The woman returns, there is a struggle and Nerine falls senseless. Leaving Nerine unconscious, and going to the station with the bag she is met by Jones, who discovers the stones in the place of the silver and hurries the woman away. Returning to the coach-house Jones receives a summons from Maurice, who puts him through a rigid interview. Agatha is suspicious that Mr. Mayne is in the plot. Maurice, with his sisters, calls upon Lady Satterlee who thinks they are alike, yet different. Satterlee admits not knowing one from the other at first. Preparations for the dance go on and Nerine is wildly happy. Lady Satterlee, as hostess, invites the Lispenards and Miss Belton to tea, preparatory to the dance, where Nerine, her heart beating happily, promises Satterlee three extra dances at supper-time, refusing one to Mr. Fairfax, Lady Satterlee's cousin. Dancing one of them, she retires to the dressing-room to arrange her hair. Satterlee, not returning she walks down the passage to another room, and indignant at his apparent neglect and the image of Agatha, is about to leave the room when he enters. He mistakes Nerine for Agatha, calling her endearing names, and leaving her to wonder, how many times, he, in talking to her thought she was Agatha. Humiliated, she assumes a new role. Going home she finds Mr. Mayne has returned, and she asks if Maurice has told him of the extraordinary things which happened in his absence. Maurice thinks Jones has something to do with it. Nerine's changed attitude causes Mr. Mayne uneasiness, and he would sleep better if he knew that Maurice's remarks meant nothing. Lord and Lady Satterlee call and announce to Mr. Mayne Agatha's engagement to Lord Satterlee. Lady Satterlee proposes to take Agatha and Nerine home with her. Mr. Mayne is determined to find other amusement for Nerine until the unfortunate silver is forgotten. Interviewing Jones, Mr. Mayne questions him regarding a servant.

CHAPTER XV. (CONTINUED.)

"I DON'T see as you can afford to offend her, sir," he said, with vicious meaning.

Mayne looked at him, and Jones' eyes fell.

"I can afford to offend her, and you, too," he said slowly. "Make no mistake about that. I suppose your past life is pretty much the same today as it has always been; no great or salient features have been providentially wiped out while I was abroad?"

Jones wiped his upper lip with the back of his hand.

"I was not meaning myself—it was Mary," he answered.

"And if Mary makes a fool of herself it is you who will pay the piper, see you to that! You can go now!"

Left alone, the dapper little man fell into so deep a fit of thought that the temperature of his carefully heated room fell several degrees before he noticed that his fire was out and that darkness had fallen.

This annoying news had simplified matters in one way; the Belton girl. Before it would not have been safe; twenty-five miles was too trivial a distance in the country to have between Nerine Lispenard and the inmate of the cottage. Of course, it was a hundred chances to one that Nerine would never visit the out-of-the-way village where danger lay, but danger was practically absent now, and an empty cottage could tell no tales, even supposing the girl did drive over on one of those senseless excursions dwellers in country houses affected.

He knew Kitty Belton would want Nerine, and Lady Belton was a friend of his, and far less likely to believe idle chatter about him than the red-headed Satterlee woman. He would consider ten pounds—his miserly soul wincing—well expended to get Nerine out of Lispenard House during her sister's absence. He could never go out without thinking that she might be prowling about and finding out something.

There was nothing like striking while the iron was hot (though not even to himself did Mr. Mayne make use of that vulgar proverb); he would get things settled as soon as the obnoxious Satterlee had taken leave. He would even—with a rueful smile—play the beneficent stepfather for the occasion! It was with wild surprise that Nerine received a message, toward nine o'clock, that Mr. Mayne would be pleased if she could speak to him. She entered the room where he was seated at his solitary dinner, prepared to know nothing in answer to any questions about the frustrated burglary, for of course that was why he wanted her. But she returned to Agatha and Kit in still greater surprise, after a ten minutes' absence.

"What did he say?" demanded these damsels, with acute interest, as she sat down in her old place on the rug in the morning-room. Did he cross-examine you as to our every movement during his absence? Did he ask you"—breathlessly—"where you got your dresses?"

"He rose and offered me a chair. I sat down. 'Would I have a glass of wine?' I would not. He would—ah—come to the point at once. Did I propose going with you, Agatha, to Lady Satterlee's."

"You said yes?"

"I said no," with a curious little smile. "I had promised to visit Miss Belton if he allowed me to go anywhere. Wait now," she added in response to the wildly diverse comments drawn from her hearers; "the point is to come!

"He agreed with me. 'Nothing was in worse form than to rush too ardently at future connections by marriage; Agatha was best alone,' and he 'hoped we would both provide ourselves with necessary additions to our wardrobe,' and he handed me this with airy grace, and opened the door for me."

She threw down on the hearth rug a twenty-pound note.

"What did you say?"

"Nothing. Bowed profoundly like Sir Charles Grandison in moments of doubt, and went out."

"Why did you take it?" Agatha said.

"Because you cannot go to the balls of the nobility with no clothes but one white satin frock, and it is all ours, not his, to begin with, and it is always well to have money. We can leave as soon as you are ready to go with Lady Satterlee."

Agatha was nearly in tears.

"I think you might come," she said.

"Mr. Mayne would not let me go with you; I could see that."

"I don't see why."

"Nor do I. But it is so. He spoke quite feelingly about it being really providential that I need not be left here alone. So feelingly, indeed, that I cast about to see if he could be in any way going to further his interest by my absence."

Could Mr. Mayne have heard her!

CHAPTER XVI.

NERINE'S RECEPTION AT BELTON COURT.

Kitty Belton and Nerine were driving in the dusk up the hilly avenue to Belton Court. Both were tired and silent after their journey, and Nerine was depressed as well. It was her first parting from Agatha, who had gone off with the Satterlees the day before, with an augmented wardrobe, and with a mind slightly injured by her sister's obstinacy in not going with her.

Nerine had made use of Mr Mayne's unwilling generosity to pay the bill for those white satins. It was bad enough to have a gown which reminded her of an evening of dust and ashes; but it was unbearable to have the bill for it hanging over her head. With what money was over she bought a black crepon, and made it with no extra pains as to trimming. It was black, and plain, and decent. The girl shuddered now at the remembrance of the careful coquetry with which she had arranged the folds of that hateful white satin.

As they ascended a steeper rise than usual Kit looked out of the open window of the brougham.

"Here we are! I thought we should never get home."

Nerine looked out as they drew up under the entrance leading to the big, gray house. What a huge place it looked, with its many windows lit up and shining, and how imposing! For the fiftieth time she wondered what Kit's mother was like, and if she would be sorry that she had not stayed at home—with her stepfather!

"Bundle out!" Kit cried, joyfully. "Never mind the things; some one will look after them."

And she dragged Nerine by the hand into the big hall and across it to the drawing-room, speaking affably to the servants as she went, and inquiring if her mother had gone up to dress yet.

"Here you are!" plunging ecstatically into the drawing-room and through a maze of furniture to a sofa drawn up to the fire at the far end, where sat a plump little lady in a velvet gown. "I thought we were going to be late for dinner, Jenkins drove so slowly," kissing her mother. "And I've brought Nerine, as you said. Agatha couldn't come, because she has got engaged, and been carried off by her mother-in-law."

"Gently, my dear, gently," Lady Belton said, laughing. "And so this is Nerine," kissing the tall girl kindly. "You are very welcome, my dear. I am glad to have you at Belton at last. And what a likeness you have to your dear father," retreating a few steps and regarding her with a softened face.

"Where's tea?" said her daughter, prosaically. "We couldn't get any at Swindon; there wasn't time."

"Tea! It is half-past seven; don't you see that I am ready for dinner? And your father will not wait an instant beyond the quarter, as you know. Run off, both of you, and wash your faces, and I will send you each a glass of sherry. Don't wait to dress now, Kit," warningly. "You must come as you are, for your father has been out all day, and won't stand your being late."

A very little thing will sometimes raise the drooping spirit. Miss Nerine Lispenard, as she went up the shining oak stairs after Kit, felt an unwonted cheerfulness stealing over her at the knowledge that for tonight at least she need not array herself in that detested satin.

"Oh, here's papa!"

Nerine looked up and saw her guide embracing a fresh-faced old gentleman with gray hair, and arrayed in a spick and span evening toilet.

"Daddy, this is Nerine. And you mustn't stop to say anything to her now, for mother says she won't wait dinner for us."

"Wait dinner! I should think not." Nerine found her hand taken in comfortable grasp. "Very glad to see you, my dear. Bless my soul!" as the girls went up and he was left alone on the landing; "what a fine young woman we have here—and what a living image of her father!"

Lady Belton was as good as her word. A neat maid stood with a tray inside the door of Miss Belton's bedroom, and Nerine drank her tiny glass of sherry and munched a dry biscuit with thankfulness, while the maid went noiselessly about and poured out warm water in her room and Kitty's, and then, with rapid, accustomed fingers, brushed and tidied the dark locks and the fair.

Oh, how comfortable to live like this every day. To lay down your hat and coat and have some one to pick them up for you. To have a huge toilet table covered with little silver pots, and a great three-sided glass, big enough to see yourself in from your head to your heels.

"Ready?" Kit broke relentlessly in upon the guest's musing. "Come along. I asked Maria what there was for dinner, and there are sweetbreads for one thing, so don't you waste any of your appetite on fish. I shan't," in a rapid whisper as they ran down-stairs. "Ah, they've gone in, have they?" to a man servant, who opened the dining-room door with a magnificent wideness as they went in.

It was a pretty room, with nothing very fashionable or smart about it; oak Turkey carpet, and ugly brown pictures were all Nerine noticed as she sat down in her high-backed chair at the dinner table. But the dinner was more than excellent, though the table was adorned with jonquils in a way that Lady Satterlee, the orchid loving, would have thought boded little for the contents of the Belton greenhouses.

"How are the children?" Kit asked in a judicial and elder-sisterly manner, as she attacked the sweetbreads.

"Very well; but Miss Bruce has had a sore throat lately and doesn't seem her usual self. I did not let them have any lessons today."

"You can take a turn at teaching them tomorrow, Kit," Sir William Belton looked up with a twinkling eye. "Your last attempt was crowned"—chuckling—"with such glory."

Kit colored.

"Daddy," she said, petulantly, "you know they were not our children; it was mother's class in the Sunday school. How could I help it if a hateful boy would accompany all the hymns on a mouth-organ? And if I had known we were going to have the history of Joseph for a lesson I would have marked the place in the book."

Sir William roared with laughter.

"She couldn't find out in which book of the Old Testament Joseph and his brethren were!" said Sir William, turning confidentially to Nerine, "and so she told the class stories about tigers and robbers till the lesson hour was over."

"My dear, you exaggerate, surely!" Lady Belton wished William would sometimes remember the presence of the servants.

But the daughter completed her father's misdemeanors.

"Oh, I did indeed!" she said, cheerfully. "Anything to get away from Joseph. And if I had not taken up their attention, mother, they would have pinched the legs of the infant class just in front. They had begun to, when I fortunately had the inspiration about robber stories."

Lady Belton shook her head, though she laughed.

"Be assured that, in view of that inspiration, I shall let the children run wild if poor Miss Bruce continues ill, rather than deliver them over to your tender mercies."

Nerine looked quickly at her hostess, but said nothing. She was sorry for the governess and her sore throat, but she wondered if Lady Belton would let her teach the children if Miss Bruce had to go home or her indisposition continued. It would be a priceless resource in the morning; give her an occupation, and something to wake up her thoughts.

"How old are they?" she asked.

"Who? Oh, the children," Kit returned. "May is twelve and Joan six, and"—with an air of unbiased judgment—"I really think Joan is a little the worst of the two."

Now, Kitty, you are too bad; I will not have it." Lady Belton's voice rose indignantly. "They are dear little girls, Nerine, though, like other people," with significance; "they sometimes let their spirits run away with them."

"May drives a tandem of donkeys all over the place, and Joan keeps a white rat in the nursery cupboard," remarked their elder sister. "And if you had been run away with and nearly killed by May and her donkeys as often as I have, or had that white rat dropped on your head in the dark, you would have an excellent idea of their spirits, mother."

"Oh, yes, that wretched beast!" Lady Belton shuddered and so, alas! did Nerine. "William," with severity, "I really think you should forbid Joan having that white rat. It is such a disgusting animal."

Sir William looked up mildly from his bunch of raisins.

"Why don't you, my dear?" was all he said; but Kit laughed outright, and Lady Belton rose rather majestically from the table.

"Nerine, you must be tired," she said, hastily. "Come, Kitty, your father wants his cigar."

"Mother is going to forbid Joan to keep her rat," Kitty said to her father in a stage whisper, "for the seventy-second time!"

And she hastened past her mother in the doorway, to escape a just rebuke from the plump little lady whom every one adored and imposed upon, but never obeyed at all.

Nerine, seated in a deep soft chair by the drawing-room fire, wondered presently why she had ever had terrors about coming. It all seemed so easy, so simple and comfortable here. The house divided against itself at home seemed very far off; Mr. Mayne a vague nuisance at worst; Satterlee—yes, even Satterlee—a dream!

Kit had disappeared immediately after dinner, and there was no one to help her out with the answers to Lady Belton's placid inquiries about the Satterlees, Maurice, her own home occupations and Agatha's.

"Mr. Mayne must be a very curious person," Lady Belton observed, "but well-meaning. Oh, well-meaning, of course!" She gave a shrewd glance at the quiet, handsome face opposite her. "And yet I don't know," slowly, "I found a letter lately which set me wondering. Did Kit tell you?"

Nerine shook her head.

"Well, perhaps she forgot it; but if I can find it in the morning, I will show it to you. It was not exactly important, only odd."

She stopped abruptly, and Nerine sat silent without taking much heed of remarks which would have made Maurice give Lady Belton no peace till the letter was produced.

CHAPTER XVII.

A NEW OCCUPATION FOR NERINE.

"Where have you been, Kitty?" Lady Belton asked, as her daughter entered, arrayed in a tea-gown which seemed to be all lace.

"Changing my dress. Mother, don't you think Nerine ought to go to bed? She must be so tired? Oh, and I went in to see Miss Bruce; you never told me she had been in bed for two days."

"My dear child, how imprudent of you! I told you the poor woman was ill, and I meant to tell you not to go to see her till we were certain that her sore throat was not the beginning of something more serious. You are so rash, Kitty."

"I'm not so fussy about every little cold, like you and Miss Bruce, mother. I believe you both enjoy your casual ailments."

"Never mind what I enjoy now, Kitty. And remember that I really forbid you to go and see Miss Bruce until the doctor is sure that she has not anything worse than a cold." Lady Belton was as ruffled as a cross canary bird. "Now understand me, Kitty. I mean it. I am not going to have you and all the children taking scarlatina. For one thing, it might utterly prevent our going up to town, and I suppose you mean to be presented this season!"

Kit laughed.

"Oh, you silly old mother," said she, as she kissed her. "Nobody has scarlatina, and nobody is going to have it. Of course, I must be presented! Hasn't my gown been ordered?"

"Ordered long ago." Her annoyance subsiding, for before Kit's visit to Lispenard House she had shied off undisguised from going to London at all. "And if you are a good girl we shall leave here in time for the last drawing-room in March."

Nerine gave a little start. They were well into February now. That meant that in three weeks she must return to Lispenard House, and her heart sank a little, though of course she could not expect Lady Belton to take her up to town.

The thought made her look so weary that her hostess saw it.

"My dear child, you must go to your bed," she said with a kindly glance, "and you, too, Kit. Oh, yes, be off with you now; we do not want any pale cheeks in the morning. I think you will be comfortable next to Kitty," as she bade Nerine good night, "and if there is anything that Kit forgets to see that you have, you must ask for it as you would at home. Go and say good night to your father, Kitty, and don't sit in that cold room of his till all hours."

Kit laughed as she left the room.

"Mother has a 'don't' for everything, but we never mind her. She means well. I'll come up with you before I go to say good night to father, you look so tired."

Tired Nerine was, but as the door closed upon Kitty she looked about her with a delicious sense of the utter luxury of being tired in such a place. The warm room, the soft water, the heaps of towels, were each one a fresh joy; the brass bed with its spring mattresses a revelation to her weary frame.

As she lay watching the flicker of the fire on the tiled hearth with its brass fittings, she wondered dreamily what Lady Belton had meant about a letter. Was it about them, or whom? It did not matter tonight anyhow; nothing—turning luxuriously in her soft linen sheets—mattered tonight but going to sleep.

She must have gone to sleep at once, for it did not seem a minute since she had watched the firelight on the glistening tiles when there was a knock at her door. But the knock meant eight o'clock, and tea and thin bread and butter; and having her bath filled with fresh cold water when the shutters were opened to let in the morning sun, and the fire burned freshly in the grate.

She felt a different being, by the time she was ready for breakfast, from the girl who had arrived weary and dejected on the previous day. How lovely the country looked, even though it was winter, she noted as she leaned out of her open window; and the grass was quite green, so different from the water-soaked yellow fields at home.

She knocked smartly at Kit's door.

"May I come in? Are you ready?"

A husky voice said something. Then Kitty's maid opened the door and came out.

"If you please, Miss Lispenard, Miss Belton says she had a bad cold, and would you tell my lady that she will not get up just yet? Miss Belton did not sleep well at all."

"Go down, Nerine, will you?" called Kitty, languidly, "and tell mother I'm all right, only sleepy."

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

The COMFORT Sisters' Corner

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

IN line with a letter from an Iowa sister, in this issue, on making clothes for a baby, is the following article on bottle feeding and care of milk, which should prove of interest to the mother, and since this is Uncle Sam's advice it can be followed with every assurance of safety.—Ed.

Bottle Feeding

Cow's milk is the most satisfactory substitute for mother's milk. The best milk (this does not mean the richest milk) is none too good. Get "certified" milk if possible. If you cannot obtain certified milk, get the cleanest and purest bottled milk you can find. Milk sold in bulk, or bottled from the can in stores, or by milkmen in their wagons, is likely to be stale and contaminated and not a proper food for the baby, even though it looks and tastes good. "Baby foods" and condensed milks and the like are not satisfactory substitutes for good cow's milk, and often harm the baby.

Raw milk may carry the germs of tuberculosis, scarlet fever, tonsilitis, diphtheria, typhoid and other communicable diseases. Unless the milk is above suspicion, danger should be prevented by proper pasteurization of the milk or by boiling or by sterilization.

Pasteurization

Pasteurization means heating the milk to about 150 degrees F. for thirty minutes and then rapidly cooling it. Milk for the baby should always be pasteurized in the feeding bottle. It may be done as follows: The milk should be mixed and poured into the clean feeding bottles, which should then be stopped with clean, non-absorbent cotton. It is then ready for pasteurization. While a number of satisfactory pasteurizers may be bought in the shops, a home-made pasteurizer can be easily constructed.

Take a wire basket that will hold all the nursing bottles for twenty-four hours and place this basket containing the bottles in a vessel of cold water filled to a point a little above the level of the milk. Heat the water and allow it to boil for five minutes. Then run cold water into the vessel until the milk is cooled to the temperature of the running water. The milk is then put into the ice chest, which should be not warmer than 50 degrees F.

Sterilization

By sterilization of milk is meant the process of rendering it germ free by boiling it on three successive days or by keeping it for fifteen minutes under pressure at a temperature of 242 degrees F.

Boiling

Milk is boiled for one or two minutes in a large vessel and poured immediately into the sterilized bottles, stoppered with cotton, rapidly cooled in running water, and put on the ice. This destroys all living bacteria but not spores or eggs, which will not do harm unless the milk is kept too long after boiling. It should be used within twenty-four hours.

If the baby's milk is to be mixed with other ingredients, such as oatmeal, barley water, rice water, sugar, etc., these should be added to the milk before pasteurization, boiling, or sterilization. When the milk is once prepared the bottle should not be opened until it is given to the baby.

Preservation of the Baby's Milk

After the baby's milk has been prepared, it is very important that it should be kept cold until it is used.

A simple ice box can be made as follows: Procure a wooden box about eighteen inches square and twelve inches deep. Get two tin boxes, one about eleven inches square and nine inches deep, the other ten inches square and nine inches deep. Cracker boxes will do. Cut the bottom out of the larger box. Place three inches of sawdust in the wooden box. Put the larger bottomless box upon the layer of sawdust and fill the space between the wooden and the outer tin box with sawdust. Fasten the pieces forming the lid of the wooden box together with cleats nailed on the outer surface. Tack about fifty layers of newspapers cut to the size of the wooden box to the inner surface of the lid. Make hinges for the lid by tacking two strips of leather onto the outside of the box and then tack additional strips of leather to the front edge of the lid to catch on nails driven into that side of the box, in order to hold the lid down tightly. The ice box is now ready for use. Into the smaller tin box put your wire basket containing the filled and stoppered nursing bottles (or a quart and a pint bottle of milk) and surround them with cracked ice. Place the smaller tin box inside the larger and close the lid. Each morning remove the inner box, pour out the water, clean, and repack with ice. Keep the ice box in a cool, shady place.

This ice box, if properly cared for, and kept full of ice, will keep a day's supply of milk cool and sweet.

Precautions to be Observed in Preparing the Baby's Food

Everything that comes in contact with the baby's food must be clean. The hands should be washed with hot water, soap, nailbrush, and dried with a clean towel before touching anything that goes into the baby's mouth. The dishes used in preparing the food should be boiled and allowed to dry from their own heat. Do not use a dish towel.

Bottles

As soon as the baby has finished his feeding throw out any remaining milk, rinse the nursing bottle, and fill it with cold water. When ready to prepare the milk for the next twenty-four hours, empty the bottles, wash them thoroughly with hot soapsuds and a bottle brush, and then rinse and boil them for fifteen minutes. The bottles are then ready for filling.

Nipples

Only nipples that can be kept clean easily should be used. They should be turned inside out, scrubbed, cleansed, and boiled. After boiling they should be kept covered in a clean, dry glass. Dirty nipples should not be kept with clean ones. Never use nipples connected with long glass or rubber tubes.

Directions for the Bottle Feeding of Babies

Complete instructions for bottle feeding cannot be given in a booklet like this. Babies that are artificially fed should be under the supervision of a physician, who should see them at regular intervals. Very young babies, or those that are not thriving, should always be seen once a week, while older healthy babies should be seen at least once a month, whether they are sick or well. The following rules and suggestions apply to all bottle-fed babies:

Before feeding warm the food to blood heat by putting the bottle in a vessel of warm water. Do not test the temperature of the milk by putting the nipple in your own mouth, but sprinkle a few drops on the inner surface of your arm. Be careful not to allow the food to become too hot and see that it does not cool too much while the baby is nursing. This can be prevented by wrapping the bottle in a piece of flannel.

Hold the bottle for the baby throughout the feeding. Do not coax the baby to take more food than it wants and do not allow it to drink longer than twenty minutes from the bottle. If it takes longer, there is something the matter with the baby or with the nipple.

If there is any food left in the bottle, throw it away; do not give it to the baby later.

In Canning Time

IF the high cost of living had been as much in evidence in the days of the fable of the grasshopper and the ant I feel sure the foolish grasshopper would not have wasted his days in dancing but would have emulated the ant and laid in a supply of food for the winter months. Possibly he knew no better so was deserving of pity (though I believe the ant was painfully truthful and unsympathetic) but we have no excuse to offer and if we choose to let the substance of garden and field waste we have no one to blame but ourselves—particularly in these days of homecanning outfits or even the old-fashioned but dependable wash-boiler, which can be used with almost equally good results. Place a rack or trivet in the bottom of the boiler to insure the circulation of water below the jars. The time of cooking varies with different vegetables but with a little care and practise good results are obtained and the amateur gardener is rewarded for his, or her labors, all through the winter months by fruits and vegetables that taste almost as good as when first taken from the garden.—Ed.

STRAWBERRY SURPRISE.—One cup of strawberry juice and one tablespoon of lemon or orange juice mixed with three quarters of a cup of sugar. Whip the whites of two small eggs to a stiff froth, add the fruit juice and sugar and one cup of cream and keep stirring until the mixture begins to thicken. Pour into glass serving dish and when stiff, cover with sweetened whipped cream and garnish with strawberries.

PLUM PRESERVE.—To eight quarts of green gages, or other plums, add four quarts of sugar and one quart of water. Prick the fruit and put in preserving kettle with cold water. Boil for five or six minutes and drain. Now put the quart of water in preserving kettle with four quarts of sugar and stir till sugar is dissolved. Boil five minutes, skimming occasionally. Into this syrup put the green gages and cook fifteen to twenty minutes. Put in sterilized jars.

PRESERVED CHERRIES AND CURRANTS.—Put one and one half quarts of currants in preserving kettle and boil, crush and strain through cheese-cloth, carefully saving all the juice. Stem and stone six quarts of cherries, losing as little juice as possible. Put the cherries, currant juice and one quart of sugar in preserving kettle and heat to boiling point, and skim. Let boil fifteen or twenty minutes. Put in sterilized jars or tumblers. MRS. T., Augusta, Maine.

CANNED STRAWBERRIES.—To every pound of berries allow ten ounces of sugar and one quarter cup of water, or, better still, that quantity of juice pressed from berries. Cook the sugar and juice to a thick syrup and let cool slightly. Put the berries into fruit jars and cover with the syrup; adjust the rubbers and covers. Surround with water of same temperature of jars and let boil ten minutes. Tighten the covers, and store in cool place.

CANNED PEAS.—Choose for this purpose peas that are tender. Wash in cold water and scald by pouring boiling water over them and draining. Pack in glass jars. Fill to the brim with cold water and adjust rubbers and put covers on loosely. Put in wash-boiler filled nearly to cover of cans with cold water. Bring to boiling point and boil one hour, adding boiling water as it evaporates. The kettle should be covered. At the end of that time add boiling water to fill jars, fasten covers and cook half an hour longer.

RHUBARB JAM.—To six pounds of rhubarb add six pounds of sugar and six medium-sized lemons, sliced thin. Cut the rhubarb in small pieces, put in large bowl, with lemons, and cover with sugar and let it stand twenty-four hours. Boil, without stirring for nearly an hour and seal in glasses, or cover with paper. M. M., Belfast, Maine.

TO CAN CHICKEN.—Dress the chicken, take out the bones of leg, thigh and breast; pack in cans, add salt to season. Fill cans one quarter full of water; put on a thick rubber, and place cap on loosely; set them on a rack in the bottom of wash-boler, fill the boiler with cold water to within two and one half inches of top of cans; bring to boiling point and boil two and one half hours for young chicken. Always keep the cover on boiler and add more water as it evaporates. When done remove from the boiler, place fresh rubber bands and screw caps on tightly, setting on a warm surface to cool before putting away. Beef and pork can be canned the same way. A. H. K., Ohio.

FRUITED SPONGE OR CUP CAKES.—One half envelope Granulated Sparkling Gelatine, one quarter cup cold water, one cup sugar, two cups grated pineapple, and one cup thick cream. Cook pineapple and sugar until thick then set aside to cool. Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes and let stand over boiling water till dissolved. When cool add to stiffly whipped cream, and beat into pineapple. Cut off tops of individual sponge or cup cakes, hollow out center and fill with above paste. Replace top of cake and cover all of cake with frosting and decorate with pieces of pineapple and figs. If desired, any fresh or canned fruit may be used in place of the pineapple for making the paste.

PEA SOUP.—One can of peas, strained, add boiling water to cover and cook till soft. Press through a strainer. Cream two tablespoons butter and two of flour, add one quart of milk, a teaspoon of salt, a dash of red pepper and one half teaspoon sugar. Add this to the strained peas and heat.

MRS. CHAS. FRIEND, Rex, Oregon.

SALMON BALLS.—One or two eggs, one cup milk, one can salmon, picked fine, and bones removed, and cracker crumbs enough to roll in balls; fry in hot lard. MRS. OTTO GRONER, Bangor, Pa.

CREAMED CHICKEN.—One and one half cups of cooked chicken, cut in small cubes, two tablespoons of butter, two tablespoons flour, one quarter teaspoon salt, same amount of pepper, and one cup of thin cream. Make a sauce of the butter, flour, salt and pepper and milk. Add the chicken and serve on toast. Peas may be added to chicken if preferred.

MASHED POTATO CAKES.—Roll left over mashed potato into balls and flatten into cakes. Put in frying pan to cook, in hot bacon fat or drippings; brown on both sides. For baked cakes, place them on a buttered dish, put a small piece of butter on top of each and let cook until lightly browned.

CHEESE BLOCKS.—Mix thoroughly one cup of soft bread crumbs, one cup grated cheese, one egg, one quarter teaspoon salt, dash of paprika. Turn on a board, pat into a sheet one inch thick and cut in one-inch squares, dip in egg and bread crumbs, and fry in deep fat until a golden brown.—Ed.

CHICKEN PATES.—Melt two tablespoons of butter in a sauce pan and gradually add two and one half tablespoons of dry flour, one third cup of hot chicken stock, one half cup of rich cream, five drops of onion juice, three teaspoons of lemon juice, salt and cayenne pepper. As soon as it boils, add one heaping cup of chopped chicken meat, and when all becomes hot again, serve at once in pate shells.

PATE SHELL PUFF PASTE.—Divide one cup of butter into quarter parts and chill. Sift three cups of flour several times and chop in one quarter part of butter and a scant half teaspoon of salt till mealy. The advantage of chopping instead of working with the fingers is to keep the butter from softening. Add ice water, a little at a time, till a firm dough is made, using a knife to stir it with. The less water used, the lighter will the paste be. Toss the dough in flour till well covered, and then onto rolling-board and roll till a little over an inch thick. Take a quarter of the butter, dredge with flour and roll into long strips and place down center of dough, then fold over the two sides of dough, edges meeting at center, then fold ends to center and double once. Pound to a flat cake with rolling pin and then roll thin. Repeat till remaining quarters of butter are used, then fold again, and roll one third of an inch thick. Cut into rounds; cut rings from rounds, using ice-water between each to hold them together. Chill till stiff and bake in a very hot oven till brown, decreasing heat the last ten minutes.

BRAN GEMS.—Two cups of milk, one and one half cups of bran, one half cup whole wheat, one half cup bread flour, one egg, two tablespoons molasses, one teaspoon soda, one half teaspoon salt and one tablespoon butter. MRS. J. E. D., Malden, Mass.

APPLE, ORANGE AND GRAPE SALAD.—Pare and cut one apple into dice and squeeze over it the juice of quarter of a lemon. Add one peeled and finely cut orange, one eighth cup of white grapes cut into halves and seeded, three tablespoons of nut meats and one tablespoon of seedless raisins. Moisten with salad dressing and serve in nests of lettuce leaves.—Ed.

CORN HOMINY.—Put twelve large ears of corn in a kettle, pour in enough water to cover well then enough ash lye to make the corn skin slip by boiling one and one half hours. Take off, wash several times, or until the corn is clean and white, put in a clean kettle and cook until well done. Season with salt and meat fryings. It is then ready to serve.

MRS. SELDON EATON, Cherryville, Mo.

RICE GRIDDLE-CAKES.—Pour one pint of warm, sweet milk over one and one half cups of boiled rice and stir until the grains are well separated. Add one tablespoon melted butter, the beaten yolks of three eggs and one cup of flour sifted with one and one half teaspoons baking powder (level), and one quarter teaspoon of salt. Beat thoroughly, stir in the stiffly beaten whites of the eggs and bake in small cakes on a well-greased griddle.—Ed.

TONGUE AND SPINACH.—Boil tongue in salt water, until it is tender, cut in thin slices, and pile it around spinach, which has been boiled until tender; drain, chop fine, and season with butter, salt and pepper. Pour over it a sauce made from one heaping teaspoon of flour, two tablespoons of butter, braided together, and stirred into a pint of milk until it thickens.

MARY NORTHEND, Salem, Mass.

FRENCH DAINTIES.—Two envelopes Granulated Sparkling Gelatine, four cups granulated sugar, one and one half cups boiling water and one cup cold water. Soak the gelatine in the cold water five minutes. Add the boiling water. When dissolved add the sugar and boil slowly for fifteen minutes. Divide into two equal parts. When somewhat cooled add to one part one half teaspoon of the lemon flavor found in separate envelope, dissolved in one tablespoon of water, and one tablespoon lemon extract. To the other part add one half teaspoon extract of cloves and color with the pink color. Pour into shallow tins that have been dipped in cold water. Let stand over night; turn out and cut into squares. Roll in fine granulated or powdered sugar and let stand to crystallize. Vary by using different flavors and colors, and adding chopped nuts, dates or figs.—Ed.

TONGUE AND SPINACH.

Knox Sparkling Lemon Jelly Dessert

Soak 1 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine in 1 cup cold water 5 minutes and dissolve in 2 cups boiling water. Add ¾ cup sugar and stir until dissolved. Then add ½ cup lemon juice. Strain into molds first dipped in cold water, and chill. Add dates, nuts, berries, oranges, bananas, fresh fruit—or canned fruit. If fruit is added to the jelly it may be served as a salad on crisp lettuce leaves, accompanying with mayonnaise or any salad dressing.

I KNOW every woman wants distinctive clothes and hats. Every woman should want distinctive table dainties. By using Knox Sparkling Gelatine you can combine your own personal ideas with our tested recipes. Each package makes four pints of jelly. Besides jellies you can make original and different Salads, Puddings, Candies, and other good things.

BAKED PARSNIPS.—Take as many parsnips as are needed and pare, skin, wash and cut down center. Boil until almost done and then put in dish. Cover the parsnips with small pieces of butter and sprinkle a little pepper over them. Add a few drops of hot water and bake until brown.—Ed.

BROWNIES.—Two eggs, one cup sugar, one half cup butter, two squares chocolate or cocoa to suit taste, three quarters cup pastry flour, one half cup chopped walnuts. Vanilla flavoring. Bake in sheet in moderate oven. No soda, cream of tartar or baking powder is used in these. Cut in strips. They will be better when two or three days old than when perfectly fresh.—Ed.

WHITE NUT CAKE.—One cup of sugar, one tablespoon of butter, two eggs, one cup sweet milk, pinch of salt, three teaspoons of baking powder, one cup of walnut meats, chopped fine, and flour to thicken. Use any desired flavoring.

MRS. HERMAN HAHN, Saginaw, Mich.

FRICASSEE OF PEAS.—Melt one and one half ounces of butter in a stewpan, add one ounce of flour and mix well. Pour in one half pint of boiling stock, add a pinch of pepper and a teaspoon of sugar. Simmer for five minutes, put in the peas (either shelled or canned) and shake them well. Warm thoroughly, add three tablespoons boiled ham, tongue or bacon, cut into very small pieces; garnish with croutons and serve hot.—Ed.

SPONGE CAKES.—Beat three egg yolks in a large cup till light yellow and scrape into mixing bowl and add one and one half cups of sugar and stir well together. Add one half cup of cold water and one teaspoon of vanilla and beat till creamy with egg beater. Add two cups of pastry flour to which has been added one half teaspoon of soda and one teaspoon of cream of tartar. Beat one minute and lastly fold in without much beating the beaten whites of three eggs. Spread dough about an inch thick in pan and bake in moderate oven.

AMBROSIA.—Two oranges, two apples, two bananas, one cup of peaches, three slices of pineapples, a little juice of each and half a package of cocoanut. Chop all the fruits together, sprinkle cocoanut and one cup of sugar over all and let stand two hours. Serve.

MRS. R. W. WILLIAMS, Llano, Texas.

GRAHAM PUFFS.—For one dozen puffs use three eggs, one pint milk, one pint graham flour, one teaspoon sugar, one half teaspoon salt. Mix the graham flour, sugar and salt, beat the eggs till very light, add the milk, then pour it upon the dry ingredients and beat well for three minutes. Turn the batter into hot greased muffin pans and bake in a hot oven one half hour.—Ed.

BAKING POWDER BISCUITS.—Mix and sift twice two cups of flour, four teaspoons of baking powder and one half teaspoon of salt. Work in two tablespoons of butter with tips of fingers and add gradually three quarters of a cup of milk, mixing quickly with a knife. Cut out and bake in a quick oven.—Ed.

EGG DUMPLING.—Two eggs, slightly beaten, one cup sweet milk, one teaspoon salt, two and one half cups flour, and two teaspoons baking powder. Drop from spoon into soup and let boil twenty minutes. Always light. MRS. CLARA L. HOWLING, Ypsilanti, Mich.

FISH ON TOAST.—Pull a cup or more, as required, of salt codfish into bits, and soak a few hours. Heat a cup of cream and put into a saucepan with the soaked fish, add pepper and a little butter, let it become boiling hot, and serve on slices of nicely browned toast. If you have not the cream, use milk thickened to creamy consistency with a little flour, adding more butter. FANNIE V. TIDD, New York, N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

After reading Lonely One's letter I could keep quiet no longer. My dear woman, you are making a mountain out of a mole-hill. If every woman reasoned as you do there would soon be no people in existence. God gave the right of motherhood to woman and I am sure that if there had been a better way of bringing children into the world He would have found it. The months are not endless as you seem to think. You are the guard of the little life God has entrusted to your keeping until prepared for its entry into the world. If you have your health and are capable of bearing a child and caring for it, do not adopt one for no matter how much you might love it, it could never be as much to you as your very own child would be. Put in your months of waiting in preparation for the little stranger. There is so much you can do. It is such a wonderful

Edith started to her feet, her face crimson.

Another moment she was in the street.

"Miss Allandale! I am more than glad to see you once more."

"Sorry to trouble you sir, but I have orders to take the lady into custody."

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Edith Allandale, the only support of an invalid mother pawns a valuable watch. To redeem it she offers a five-dollar gold piece, paid to her by Royal Bryant, to the broker, who, dropping it into the drawer declares it a counterfeit and returns it. Going home her mother suggests it may be genuine and again Edith goes out to buy food and coal. While eating supper an officer enters, followed by the grocer who insists upon Edith's arrest for passing counterfeit money. She is hurried to the station house, leaving her mother in the care of Kate O'Brien. Edith writes to Royal Bryant explaining the situation. He redeems the watch, secures Edith's release and sends her home, where she finds her mother dying. After her death in reading letters, Edith learns she is an adopted daughter, the child of a dear friend, who believes she is legally a wife, until the father of her child admits his perfidy and deserts her. Edith writes Mr. Bryant, giving no address and goes to Boston, securing a position as companion with Mrs. Gerald Goddard. Edith discovers there is a skeleton in the family, when Mrs. Goddard accuses her of attempting to steal her husband's affections. Emil Correlli, Mrs. Goddard's brother is persistent in his attentions to Edith; she tries to avoid him and decides to leave. Mrs. Goddard begs her to stay. Edith, going to walk renders assistance to Mrs. Stewart, who is attracted to her and shows agitation when she learns she is a companion to Mrs. Goddard, and if she needs a friend to come to her. Edith is overtaken by Emil Correlli. Nearing Mrs. Goddard's house, a woman, unknown to Edith addresses Emil in a foreign tongue. Realizing that Edith thinks there is something mysterious in his relation to this woman he endeavors to set it right, renews his protestations of love, offers marriage and is staggered by her refusal. Mrs. Goddard unfolds a scheme which cannot fail to make Edith Allen his wife, but Emil must go away. Mrs. Goddard plans with Edith for a "mid-winter frolic," at their country home. The housekeeper. Mrs. Weld, overhears Mr. Goddard entreating his wife for a certain document. Mrs. Goddard proposes a theatrical performance entitled "The Masked Bridal." The guests arrive. Mrs. Weld takes a folded paper from Mrs. Goddard's jewel case; it vindicates her. Mrs. Goddard, having sent for Edith and seeing Mrs. Weld in an adjoining room devises a scheme to get her from meeting Edith to whom she explains that Miss Kerby and brother who have the leading parts, have been summoned home and requests Edith to supply Miss Kerby's place. Edith objects to what appears sacrilege. Over persuaded she consents and veiled and masked the ceremony is performed. When she hears Mrs. Goddard congratulate Emil she grasps the duplicity and nearly falls senseless. Mrs. Goddard, returning to the ballroom asks Emil to introduce his friend, Mrs. Stewart. Meeting her, Mrs. Goddard calls her husband, who recognizes in Mrs. Stewart his former wife. Recovering from the shock Edith talks with Mrs. Goddard, who implores her to see Emil and forgive his deception. She listens to his entreaties and later his commands and utterly refuses to ever break bread at his table. The following morning Edith finds her door locked on the outside. Mrs. Goddard appears with an appetizing breakfast and with the information they are to leave for Boston. Two notes, one from Gertrude Weld and the other from Isabel Stuart, are slipped beneath her door, each one assuring interest and protection. Realizing her only means of escape is from seeming compliance to their wishes, Edith returns with them to Boston and is shown to the guest chamber, which has been beautifully refurnished by Emil, who hopes to win his wife, with luxuries which only wealth can give. Giulia Fiorini, with her little boy, who has been recognized as Emil Correlli's wife gains admittance to Edith's room. Telling the story of her betrayal Edith assures her of her sympathy and that she has no love for Emil, and blesses her that she is saved from a fate she abhors.

CHAPTER XXII.

"I WILL RISE ABOVE MY SIN AND SHAME!"

EDITH'S strange visitor stood contemplating her with a look of mingled perplexity and sadness.

"I shall be free!" Edith murmured again with a longdrawn sigh of relief, "for of course you will assert your claim upon him, and"—with a glance at the child—"he will not dare to deny it."

"You are so anxious to be free? You would bless me for helping you to be free?" repeated her companion, studying the girl's face earnestly, questioningly.

"Ah, yes; I was almost in despair when you came in," Edith replied, shivering, and with starting tears; "now I begin to hope that my life has not been utterly ruined."

"My curse be upon him for all the evil he has done!" the woman cried, passionately. "Oh! how gladly would I break the bond that binds you to him, but—I have not the power; I have no claim upon him."

Edith regarded her with astonishment.

"No claim upon him?" she repeated, with another glance at the little one who was gazing from one to another with wondering eyes.

The mother's glance followed hers, and an expression of despair swept over her face.

"Oh, Holy Virgin, pity me!" she moaned.

Then lifting her heavy eyes once more to Edith, she continued, falteringly:

"The boy is his and—mine; but—I have no legal claim upon him—I am no wife."

For a moment after this humiliating confession there was an unbroken silence in that elegant room.

At length Edith raised her hand and laid it half-timidly, but with exceeding kindness, upon the other's shoulder.

"I understand you now," Edith said, gently, "and I am very sorry."

The words were very simple and commonplace; but they proved too much for the mother's self-possession, and, with a moan of anguish, throwing herself upon her knees beside her child, she clasped him convulsively in her arms and burst into a flood of weeping.

"Oh! my poor, innocent baby! to think that this curse must rest upon you all your life—it breaks my heart!" she moaned, while she passionately covered his head and face with kisses. They tell me there is a God," she went on, hoarsely, as she again struggled to her feet, "but I do not believe it—no God of love would ever create monsters like Emil Correlli, and allow them to deceive and ruin innocent girls, blackening their pure souls and turning them to fiends incarnate! Yes, I mean it," she panted, as she caught Edith's look of horror at her irreverent and reckless expressions.

"Listen!" she continued, eagerly. "Only three years ago I was a pure and happy girl, living with my parents in my native land—fair, beautiful, sunny Italy——"

"Italy?" breathlessly interposed Edith, as she suddenly remembered that she also had been born in that far Southern clime. Then she grew suddenly pale as she caught the eyes of the little one gazing curiously into her face, and also remembered that "the curse" which his mother had but a moment before so deplored, rested upon her as well.

Involuntarily, she took his little hand, and lifting it to her lips, imprinted a soft caress upon it, at which the child smiled, showing his pretty white teeth, and murmured some fond term in Italian.

"You are an angel not to hate us both," said his mother, a sudden warmth in her tones, a gleam of gratitude in her dusky eyes. "But were you ever in Italy?" she added.

"Yes, when I was a little child; but I do not remember anything about it," said Edith, with a sigh. "Do not stand with the child in your arms," she added, thoughtfully. "Come, sit here, and then you can go on with what you were going to tell me."

And, with a little sense of malicious triumph, Edith pulled forward the beautiful rocker of carved ivory, and saw the woman sink wearily into it with a feeling of keen satisfaction. It seemed to her like the irony of fate that it should be thus occupied for the first time.

"My father was an olive grower, and owned a large vineyard besides, in the suburbs of Rome. He was a man of ample means, and took no little pride in the pretty home which he was enabled to provide for his family. My mother was a beautiful woman, somewhat above him socially, although I never knew her to refer to the fact, and I was their only child.

"Like many other fond parents who have but one upon whom to expend their love and money, they thought I must be carefully reared and educated—nothing was considered too good for me, and I had every advantage which they could bestow. I was happy—I led an ideal life until I was seventeen years of age. When carnival time came around, we all went in to Rome to join in the festivities, and there I met my fate, in the form of Emil Correlli."

"Ah! but I thought that he was a Frenchman!" interposed Edith, in surprise.

"His father was a Frenchman, but his mother was born and reared in Italy, where, in Rome, he studied under the great sculptor, Powers," her guest explained. Then she resumed: "We met just as we were both entering the church of St. Peter's. He accidentally jostled me; then, as he turned to apologize, our eyes met, and from that moment my fate was sealed. I cannot tell you all that followed, dear lady, it would take too long; but, during the next three months it seemed to me as if I were living in Paradise. Before half that time had passed, Emil had confessed his love for me, and made an excuse to see me almost every day. But my parents did not approve; they objected to his attentions; his mother, they learned by some means, belonged to a noble family, and 'lords and counts should not mate with peasants,' they said.

"Then I made the fatal mistake of disobeying them and meeting my lover in secret. Ah, lady," she here interposed with a bitter sigh, "the rest is but the old story of man's deception and a maiden's blind confidence in him: and when, all too late, I discovered my error, there seemed but one thing for me to do, and that was to flee with him to America, whither he was coming to pursue his profession in a great city."

"And—did he not offer to—to marry you before you came?" queried Edith, aghast.

"No; he pretended that he dared not—he was so well-known in Rome that the secret would be sure to be discovered, he said, and then my father would separate us forever; but he promised that when we arrived in New York, he would make everything all right; therefore, I, still blindly trusting him, let him lead me whither he would.

"I was very ill during the passage, and for weeks following our arrival, and so the time slipped rapidly by without the consummation of my hopes, and though he gave me a pleasant home and everything that I wished for in the house where we lived, even allowing it to appear that I was his wife, we had not been here long before I saw that he was beginning to tire of me. I did everything I could to keep his love, I studied tirelessly to master the language of the country, and kept myself posted upon art and subjects which interested him most, in order to make myself companionable to him. Time after time I entreated him to right the wrong he was doing me and another, who would soon come either into the shelter of his fatherhood or to inherit the stigma of a dishonored mother; but he always had some excuse with which to put me off. At last this little one came"—she said, folding the child more closely in her arms—"and I had something pure and sweet to love, even though I was heart-broken over knowing that a blight must always rest upon his life, and something to occupy the weary hours which, at times, hung so heavily upon my hands. After that Emil seemed to become more and more indifferent to me—there would be weeks at a time that I would not see him at all; I used sometimes to think that the boy was a reproach to him, and he could not bear the stings of his own conscience in his presence."

"Ah," interposed Edith, with a scornful curl of her red lips, "such men have no conscience; they live only to gratify their selfish impulses."

"Perhaps; while those they wrong live on and on, with a never-dying worm gnawing at their vitals," returned her companion, repressing a sob.

"At last," she resumed, "I began to grow jealous of him, and to spy upon his movements. I discovered that he went a great deal to one of the up-town hotels, and I sometimes saw him go out with a handsome woman, whom I afterward learned was his sister—the Mrs. Goddard, who lives here, and who visits New York several times every year. I did not mind so much when I discovered the relationship between them, although I suffered many a bitter pang to see how fond they were of each other, while I was starving for some expression of his love.

"This went on for nearly two years; then about two months ago, Emil disappeared from New York, without saying anything to me of his intentions, although he left plenty of money deposited to my account. He was always generous in that way, and insisted that Ino must have everything he wished or needed—I am sure he is fond of the child, in spite of everything. By perseverance and ceaseless inquiry, I finally learned that he had come to Boston, and I immediately followed him. I am suspicious and jealous by nature, like all my people, and that day, when I saw him walking with you, and looking at you just as he used to look at me in those old delicious days in Italy, all the passion of my nature was aroused to arms. Braving everything, I rushed over to him and denounced him for his treachery to me, also accusing him of making love to you."

"And did it seem to you that I was receiving his attentions with pleasure?" questioned Edith. "I assure you he had forced his company upon me, and I only endured it to save making a scene in the street.

"I did not stop to reason about your appearance," said the woman; "at least not further than to realize that you were very lovely, and just the style of beauty to attract Emil; but he swore to me that you were only the companion of his sister, and he had only met you on the street by accident—that you were nothing to him. He asked me to tell him where he could find me, and promised that he would come to me later. He kept his word, and has visited me every few days ever since, treating me more kindly than for a long time, but insisting that I must keep entirely out of the way of his sister. And so it came upon me like a deadly blow when I read that account of his marriage in yesterday's paper. I was wrought up to a perfect frenzy, especially when I came to the statement that Monsieur and Madam Correlli would return immediately to Boston, but leave soon after for a trip South and West, and ultimately sail for Europe. That was more than outraged nature could bear, and I vowed that I would wreak a swift and sure revenge upon you both, and so, for two days. I have haunted this house, seeking for an opportunity to gain an entrance unobserved. I saw you sitting at the window—I recognized you instantly. I believed, of course, that you were a willing bride, and imagined that if I could get in I should find you both in this room. While I watched my chance, one of the servants came to the area door to let in the gas-man, and carelessly left it ajar, while she went back with him into one of the rooms. In a moment I was in the lower hall, looking for a back stairway; if any one had found me I was going to beg a drink of water for my child. There was a door there, but it was locked; but desperation makes one keen, and I was not long in finding a key hanging up on a nail beneath a widow-sill. The next instant the door was unlocked, and I on my way up-stairs——"

"And the key! oh! what did you do with the key?" breathlessly interposed Edith, grasping at this unexpected chance to escape.

"I have it here, lady," said her companion, as she produced it. "I thought it might be convenient for me to go out the same way, so took possession of it."

"Ah, then the door to the back stairway is still unlocked?" breathed Edith, with trembling lips.

"Yes; I did not stop to lock it after me; I hurried straight up here, but—expecting to have a very different interview from what I have had," responded the woman, with a heavy sigh. "Now, lady, you have my story," she continued, after a moment of silence, "you can see that I have been deeply wronged, and though from a moral standpoint, I have every claim upon Emil Correlli, yet legally, I have none whatever; and, unless you can prove some flaw in that ceremony of night before last—prove that he fraudulently tricked you into a marriage with him, you are irrevocably bound to him."

Edith shivered with pain and abhorrence at these last words, but she did not respond to them in any way.

"I came here with hatred in my heart toward you," the other went on, "but I shall go away blessing you for your kindness to me; for, instead of shrinking from me, as one defiled and too depraved to be tolerated, you have held out the hand of sympathy to me and listened patiently and pityingly to the story of my wrongs."

As she concluded, she dropped her face upon the head of her child with a weary, disheartened air that touched Edith deeply.

"Will you tell me your name?" she questioned, gently, after a moment or two of silence. "Pardon me," she added, flushing, as her companion looked up sharply, "I am not curious, but I do not know how to address you."

"Giulia Fiorini. Holy Mother forgive me the shame I have brought upon it!" she returned, with a sob. "I have called him"—laying her trembling hand upon the soft, silky curls of her child—"Ino Emil."

"Thank you," said Edith, "and for your confidence in me as well. You have been greatly wronged; and if there is any justice or humanity in law, this tie which so fetters me, shall be annulled; then, perchance, Monsieur Correlli may be persuaded to do what is right toward you."

"No, lady, I have no hope of that," said Giulia, dejectedly, "for when a man begins to tire of the woman whom he has injured he also begins to despise her, and to consider himself ill-used because she even dares to exist."

"Perhaps you would wish to repudiate him."

"Oh, no; much as I have suffered, I still love Emil, and would gladly serve him for the remainder of my life, if he would but honor me with his name; but I know him too well ever to hope for that—I know that he is utterly selfish and would mercilessly set his heel upon me if I should attempt to stand in the way of his purposes. There is nothing left for me but to go back to my own country, confess my sin to my parents, and hide myself from the world until I die."

"Ah! but you forget that you have your child to rear and educate, his mind and life to mold, and—try to make him a better man than his father," said Edith.

"Oh, that you should have thought of that, when I, his mother, forget my duty to him, and think only of my own unhappiness!" sobbed the conscience-stricken girl. "Yesterday I told myself that I would send Ino to him, and then end my misery forever."

"Don't!" exclaimed Edith, her face almost convulsed with pain. "Your life belongs to God, and—this baby. Live above your trouble, Giulia; never let your darling have the pain and shame of learning that his mother was a suicide. If you have made one mistake, do not imagine that you can expiate it by committing another a hundredfold worse. Ah! think what comfort there would be in rearing your boy to a noble manhood, and then hear him say, 'What I am my mother has made me!'"

"Oh, you have saved me!" the unhappy woman sobbed; "you have poured oil into my wounds. I will do as you say—I will rise above my sin and shame; and if Ino lives to be an honor to himself and the world, I shall tell him of the angel who saved us both. I am very sorry for you," she added, looking, regretfully, up at Edith, "I could almost lay down my life for you now; but—Correlli is rich—very rich, and you may, perhaps, be able to get some comfort out of life by——"

Edith started to her feet, her face crimson.

"What?" she cried, scornfully, "do you suppose that I could ever take pleasure in spending even one dollar of his money? Look there!" pointing to the elegant apparel upon the bed. "I found all those awaiting me when I came here today. In the dressing-case yonder there are laces, jewels, and fine raiment of every description, but I would go in rags before I would make use of a single article. I loathe the sight of them," she added, shuddering. "I should feel degraded, indeed, could I experience one moment of pleasure arrayed in them."

Suddenly she started, and looked at her watch, a wild hope animating her.

It was exactly quarter past two.

A train left for New York, via the Boston & Albany Railroad, at three o'clock.

If she could reach the Columbus avenue station, which was less than fifteen minutes' walk from Commonwealth avenue, without being missed, she would be in New York by nine o'clock, and safe, for a time at least, from the man she both hated and feared.

CHAPTER XXIII.

A SURPRISE AT THE GRAND CENTRAL STATION.

"Will you help me?" Edith eagerly inquired, turning to her companion, who had regarded her wonderingly while she repudiated the costly gifts holy feeling to know that you are the lifeboat for a human soul and that it depends largely upon you as to whether that soul reaches a harbor or not. You will not go insane. Do not think of nerves. Try to be pleasant and cheerful and I know you will be happy. I trust, Lonely One, we will hear from you again and that it will then be Happy One.

I have been married a little over two years to one of the best of men, or boy as I might say for we were each only a little past nineteen years of age when we were married. We have a baby girl, Mary Evelyn, now seven months old. I am sure you could not find a happier home anywhere than ours.

I have been an interested reader of the "in-law" question. I think in the majority of cases the fault lies with the mother-in-law. Deep down in her heart is the feeling that her son's wife has stolen her boy from her. She, who has always been first, must now take second place, and it hurts. She may love her daughter-in-law but that feeling is still there and human nature must show itself once in a while. I once heard a mother ask her son, who had been married eight years and had two boys, if he did not wish he had never married but had stayed home with father and mother. I shall never forget his look of astonishment as he said, "Why no, mother, I wouldn't take anything for May and the boys." While I censured the mother for the question, my pity was aroused when a kind of helpless look stole over her face as she said, "Mamma is first no more." Look ahead, sisters, to the time when your boys will leave you for another and looking thus and realizing what it will mean to you, you will be enabled to forgive those petty annoyances which pain you now and to love your husband's mother as never before.

I spend all my spare time in reading for I cannot do fancy-work of any kind. I think the stories in COMFORT are fine.

Love and best wishes to all, MRS. F. W.

IOWA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

The letter from "COMFORT Reader" of Detroit, asking about first wardrobe for baby interested me. If she will procure the two books published by the Dept. of Labor at Washington, D. C., I think she will get all the information she would need, for I, like her, am expecting the first little stranger this summer. The books are entitled "Prenatal Care" and "Infant Care," and there is a wonderful lot of good things in them.

Of course "COMFORT Reader" do as you please but if I were you I would not make many of the first little clothes. If you have none of the clothes made yet you could buy most of what you need. I have made a few things but they are outgrown so soon and you can buy them ready made for so little money that I am in favor of that. At a well-known Chicago mail-order house I bought the nicest little "Gertrude" style white flannelette petticoats for twenty-five cents each. Who could sit and sew them for that. I am making two white nainsook petticoats with crocheted lace around the bottom, and two good white dresses. One is India Linon, very fine, and the other of fine white embroidery. Instead of dresses for the first few months I have bought little white flannelette wrappers, open all the way down the front. The less a tiny baby is handled the better it is for it. My doctor told me to use a cloth of part wool and cotton for making bands, and two third wool "Reubens" shirts, as a baby needs wool on its little abdomen for the first year at least. If you buy your outfit get plenty of what you get but don't buy many fancy things. Mine are very plain so they will launder easily. I used snap fasteners instead of buttons, as they are so much easier to fasten besides it saves making buttonholes. If you care to write to me personally I will tell you more about my outfit and my plans than I can here. Would be pleased to hear from you as it seems we are kindred spirits this summer.

Lonely One, I know just how you feel and I wish I could have a personal talk with you. I am nearly twenty-two years old and I see by your letter that you are twenty-four. If I could tell you how the days and months have flown by for me you would not dread the waiting. Of course the last months are the harder, but the days are going by too fast for me as I am not ready yet for the time to come and as for worrying, I try not to think of that. I am, as you say you are, a strong, healthy woman so why should I worry? Didn't our own dear mothers have just as long to wait for us and are we any better than they? I'll never forget the words of my own dear mother to me a short time ago. They were, "Of course I know my suffering was terrible but when my child was dressed and brought to me I soon forgot about that and was only grateful to think I had my baby in my arms." I have made up my mind to feel the same way. We have ten modern conveniences to our mother's one, and competent doctors, so let us hear soon that you expect a little baby to brighten your lonely home. Think of old age and no remembrance of baby arms and baby love and no one to love and care for us. It is something I don't like to think of.

"COMFORT Sister," instead of spending the rest of the time in the house sewing, get out of doors and breathe the pure fresh air and plant a little garden which will do you and your baby more good than fancy baby clothes. Am I not right, sisters?

I will leave my address with Mrs. Wilkinson and she will forward any letters to me. I would be glad to hear from the sisters and will answer what letters I can, but as I live on a farm I do not have much spare time.

MRS. A. B. C.

WHEELER, R. R. 1, TEXAS.

DEAR ONES:

Will you allow another talkative sister a seat in your interesting corner?

Arkansas Sister, I want to say to you, and to all other sisters who think as you do, that I don't believe you would have that opinion of the city girl if you knew more about her. You say, "The young men of our country all say 'Give me the country girl,'" etc. Now I did not accept a seat in this lovely, peace-loving corner to condemn anyone, especially a girl or a woman, whether she lives in a peaceful cottage among the Ozark Mountains, in the heart of a city, or in the jungles of Africa, but I am here to explain to some of you that all city girls aren't of the poodle-dog or questionable types. Do you realize that the commercial wheels of our Nation are, to a great extent, turned by our city girls and women? Think of the thousands of girls who stand behind counters, think of the poorly ventilated factories, shops, offices, etc., where thousands of girls are working for a measley existence. Oh! country woman, have compassion. Circumstances, I think, sap one's life. While the city girl may be different from the country girl she is just as good. I know hundreds of city girls who are well educated, trained in some line of business and who can manage a house from cellar to attic. Some of my friends are married to city men and are proving themselves to be excellent companions.

If a girl who was used to living in the country and was opposed to city life as much as our beloved Arkansas sister, should marry a city man would she be apt to make a "suitable companion?" Of course we think not. She would become homesick and cry for the onion blossoms.

On the other hand, if a city girl who was used to living in the city and knew nothing about farm life, should marry a farmer would she be apt to make a "suitable companion?" Again it is, as a rule, the negative.

Sometimes love, courage, reason and tact will make a successful marriage, no matter how different the environment of the contracting parties may be, but I think the above illustrations are the rule.

Therefore, let the city man marry the city girl, the country man the country girl and may the dear Lord watch over them all, and may all of us women live in human sympathy with each other, ready to give a helping hand to any sister, no matter where she lives.

I am twenty-one years of age. Am five feet two inches tall and weigh one hundred and twenty pounds. Have brown hair, blue eyes and a fair complexion. Have lived in cities the greater part of my life. Have been an orphan since I was fifteen years old and have made my own living since I was sixteen, so you see I know whereof I speak. I think this is a wonderful world to live in and I, like Pollyanna, find lots for which to be glad.

My sister, who died the first of the year, was a subscriber to dear old COMFORT. I am staying out here on the farm helping take care of her small children and I find COMFORT a great help to me. I shall go back to the city in a month or two and I intend to subscribe for COMFORT for I know it will be a comfort to me after my day's work and make me feel that my sphere in life is widened.

May God bless every one is the wish of an Oklahoma City Sister.

Oklahoma City Sister. With the coming of every number of COMFORT to your home in the city please regard it as bringing my good wishes as a personal message to you to aid in cheering you after a particularly trying day in store or office—not that I regard myself and aforesaid good wishes as an antidote for trouble, but it may help some.—Ed.

VERNON, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I am a new subscriber to COMFORT but have learned to love it dearly and watch eagerly for its coming. I am twenty years old and have been married three years and have two dear little girls, Lois Lee, age two years, and Frances Elizabeth, aged four months.

In reading Mary's letter in February COMFORT, I would not advise her to marry unless she truly loved for I believe that love is the chief and necessary requisite for a happy marriage. Even if she never marries she can make her life happy, contented and useful by doing her life's work well, helping others and meeting the world with a cheerful smile.

Mrs. J. D. Burton, I almost envy your beautiful home, you paint its rustic beauties so vividly.

Lonely One, I think you are looking at your problem from only the unpleasant side. Why not take another view of it? Think of the joy of preparing the simple, yet dainty, garments for the little one that is to be and, too, of safeguarding your own health so that it may come into this world with an heritage of health. I think if you are strong enough, and able financially, to give the little one good care and a good home, you are doing wrong to deny yourself a woman's crown of glory—motherhood.

Mrs. P., I think you struck the vital note of religion when you said lend a strengthening hand to the poor fallen women. Why are so many of us ready to condemn the woman and let the man go free? If the gates of society would close as readily upon the man as the woman there would be less of this horror among us.

Mrs. Maude Hurst, I, too, think a woman can be too devoted to a man? I think he should do a little of the devotion stunt himself, but I also think a woman should try to interest herself in some of the things which interest her husband for if their interests grow apart so will their lives.

I hope our little sunbeam, Mattie Mae Clark, will continue to call often. She is the very essence of cheerfulness. May God bless her.

Best wishes to all, MRS. HENRY LEE THOMAS.

TRINITY, N. C.

DEAR SISTERS ALL:

I have just finished reading Mattie Mae Clark's letter in March COMFORT and like it so well that I feel I can face any number of you good sisters, though I'm rather timid, to get to Mattie Mae's side and squeeze her little hand. You are one after my own heart, dear girl. I agree with you in thinking it right to answer the letter you received from the jail. If everyone felt toward wrongdoers as you do, I am confident there would be fewer of them. It is marvelous the impetus for good or evil we find in our associates. So much depends upon our knowledge that someone cares what we do and what we are. We are bound to respect in a greater or less degree every confidence placed in us.

I am a little country maid, eighteen years old, with fair complexion, auburn hair—please, not red—and blue eyes. And I enjoy the country, but I'm not averse to city life either, because it has so many, many conveniences. It seems to me, however, that enough depends upon the person himself to make or mar his happiness despite his surroundings. I sweep and dust, bake and stew, help tend garden and flowers and delight in it all. I have no sisters, but two rollicking brothers who keep me hustling to fill their many wants. They are very good though to help me with the work and often carry water from the spring, and wood for me before they leave for their work, and—I'll whisper it though for fear it might make them blush to hear it—they both can make fine biscuits! Our mother is an invalid so we each try to do our best for her.

Every Sunday we go to a little country church for Sunday school, where I have a class of bright-eyed girls and boys, that I delight to teach.

Right here, sisters, let me ask a question. How do you plan your Sunday dinner? We wish that to be a little extra with as little work as possible. I'm sure some of the sisters have excellent plans and we might exchange helpful ideas on this subject. I prepare everything possible on Saturday, such as baking bread, pies and cake. Then it is nice to have some vegetable that can be easily prepared while breakfast is cooking Sunday morning. Gelatine desserts are excellent as they are so quickly prepared. Thus, with little work, a substantial meal is ready for Sunday and we feel much better than we would to stand over a hot stove and tend it, besides breaking the Sabbath by unnecessary labor.

I am an ardent lover of books. Among my favorites are: "Pollyanna," "Wide, Wide World," "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "Michael O'Halloran," "The Rosary," "Little Women," "David Copperfield," etc. For a severe attack of the blues, I heartily recommend the book, "Helen's Babies," by John Habberton, and think I can safely guarantee a complete cure. I, too, jot down the titles of the books I read, with the author's name, and also find it nice to write down selections from those I'd like to remember.

I shall be very glad to hear from any who care to write, but can't promise to answer all, however much I'd like to.

Sincerely, a little sister, FANNIE GRAY CROKER.

Fannie. A little later COMFORT is to give its readers an article on fireless cookers and their manufacture at home. This is the one thing needed to make Sunday what it should be, a day of rest.—Ed.

KANSAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Here comes an old maid to chat with you a while. I wish more old maids would write to our dear paper. I have read "Mary's" letter in February COMFORT. I, for one, would not marry if I did not love anyone and I don't think she would be happy if she did. I, too, have had chances to marry but I preferred to be called "old maid" than to marry and not be happy. There are two kinds of old maids—one kind is a hater of men and children, but a lover of cats and the possessor of a cross, peevish disposition; the other class are not married simply because the right man—the man who comes up to their ideals—did not appear. As a rule they are fond of children and are friends to all around them. Let us be like that old maid. I feel it my duty to remain unmarried and care for my dear old gray-haired father and mother who have done as much for me, as yours did for you. They sacrificed for us and endured hardships for our sake and loved us whether we were good or bad and we must repay them while they are here to enjoy it.

I will come again and tell how I make my pin money. Love to all, Mother's Old Maid.

DUBLIN, GA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

It is so easy to tell how a child should be brought up but when the inexperienced person undertakes the task they find it a very difficult thing to do and as no two children are alike most of us hesitate to give advice. Nevertheless, as our kind editor has given us permission to write on this interesting subject I will venture to tell a few things which I have learned by actual experience and hope it will benefit some other mother.

I have four children two girls and two boys that I am teaching to be truthful and obedient and I find the best method of commanding obedience is to always tell them the truth; be kind to them and answer their questions, if possible, and join in their play. Husband and I often join in their sports and we have jolly times together.

I want to say a word to the children, those of you who have good mothers and fathers. Don't ever give them an unkind word or treat them ill. When I was a little girl I adored my mother and now that she is dead I miss her and it saddens me to pass our old home. It seems to me that I can see again her kindly face, her eyes of blue and feel again the touch of her dear hands, always soft and gentle. Some day I hope we'll meet again.

As to women's rights, I believe that men and women were created with equal rights. Franchise is a man-made law or right and the withholding of it from woman has not been from a consideration of her rights, but man has doubted the expediency of it and that doubt has been increased by his knowledge of her extreme loyalty to fashion, the prevailing style of which is far from suggestive of either intelligence or uplift—a word to the wise is sufficient.

Best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and COMFORT sisters,
MRS. I. C. KEEN.

WACO, 1904 Cumberland St., TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I never thought of writing to this column until I read the letter from Arkansas sister. It is strange to think of the opinion people sometimes form of city life. I have some girl friends who live in the country and I love them. I love any girl who is good and pure, whether she has been reared in the country or city. But some people get the idea into their heads that these girls never dwell in the cities. But they are found everywhere, in both city and country—for they've had a real, true mother to care for them, whether she be old-fashioned or not. Isn't it just as possible for the city girl to learn all household duties and be just as capable of making a good, true companion as any country girl? I wonder how the young men of Arkansas sisters' locality know so much about a city girl caring for a home? But at any rate there are lots of marriages taking place in the cities and most of the homes prove to be happy, and if the wives are not suitable companions how could these homes be happy? And some of the wives were city girls, too. I don't agree with anybody, whether from the city or country, who tries to hold up one class of people and run others down. I believe in respecting each other's feelings and not being too ready to judge others, especially when we don't know much about them.

Do I believe in Woman Suffrage? Sure! I believe in everybody standing up for their rights—that's why I'm writing this letter.

I am just a seventeen-year-old girl—yes, I live in the city. I send lots of love just the same to Mrs. Wilkinson and everybody.

MINNIE ESTELLE SMITH.

INDIANAPOLIS, 318 N. Bradley Ave., IND.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Georgie, dear, I do not agree with you. I live in the city, have a modern home, but would give up everything for a nice little home in the country. I will admit it is a little lonesome but one soon gets over that. A simple life and fresh air are essential to good health and health brings happiness no matter where you live and as for my children, I would be content to have them strong healthy farmers.

Now for my real reason for writing. I want advice: I am the mother of three dear children, Camille Marie, three years and ten months, Dorothy May, two years and three months and Charles Eugene, one year old. Dorothy May is a perfect little monkey when it comes to mischief and she makes life miserable for Eugene. She picks on him and teases him from morning until night. Sometimes my patience gives out and I punish her. Give me advice some of you older and wiser mothers.

Here is another problem. Have any of you children that cry all the time at everything and anything. Camille is surely a problem to me. She cries when her father comes home, she cries if a neighbor calls, people she sees every day. She will be playing and all at once will start to cry and when I ask why she says, "I don't know." I have had her examined by good doctors and they say she is a strong, healthy child, so what am I to do? I can't take her any place for she will cry without a minute's notice.

I am five feet, three inches tall and weigh one hundred and twenty-two pounds. Have black curly hair and brown eyes.

I would like to hear from the COMFORT sisters, especially those from New York and Ohio.

Best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and all,
A Friend, MRS. R. C. EDWARDS.

Mrs. Edwards. Your little Camille is a problem to me, too, but let us hope some of the good

ROYAL BAKING POWDER
saves eggs

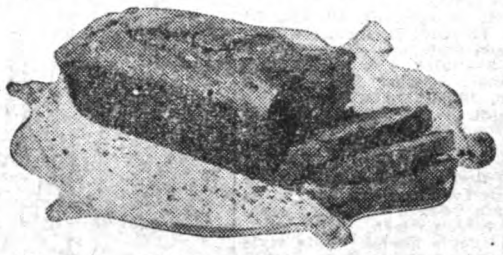
Another advantage to the housewife. The family may have excellent home-baked foods and yet make a substantial saving. Royal saves half of the egg cost.

In many recipes the number of eggs may be reduced one-half or more and often left out altogether by adding a small quantity of Royal Baking Powder, about a teaspoon, in place of each egg omitted.

Try the following recipes and see how well this plan works. You must use Royal Baking Powder to get the best results—powders made from alum and other materials derived from mineral sources often leave a bitter taste.

Cream Layer Cake

1 cup sugar — 1 cup milk — 2 cups flour — 2 tablespoons butter
1 egg — 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder — 1 teaspoon flavoring



DIRECTIONS:—Cream the sugar and butter together, then mix in the egg. After sifting the flour and baking powder together two or three times, add it all to the mixture. Gradually add the milk and beat with spoon until you have a smooth pour batter. Add the flavoring. Pour into two buttered layer cake tins and bake in a moderately hot oven for 20 minutes. Put together with Cream Filling and cover top and sides with White Icing.

CREAM FILLING

¾ cup sugar — 1 teaspoon butter — 2 tablespoons cornstarch
1 cup milk — 1 teaspoon flavoring

DIRECTIONS:—Mix cornstarch with a little of the cold milk and stir into boiling milk. Add butter and sugar; boil 5 minutes. When nearly cold, add flavoring and spread between layers.

(The old method called for 3 eggs)

Eggless, Milkless, Butterless Cake

1 cup brown sugar — 1 teaspoon nutmeg
1¼ cups water — 1 teaspoon cinnamon
1 cup seeded raisins — ½ teaspoon salt
2 ounces citron, cut fine — 2 cups flour
½ cup shortening — 5 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder

DIRECTIONS:—Boil sugar, water, fruit, shortening, salt and spices together in saucepan 3 minutes. When cool, add flour and baking powder which have been sifted together. Mix well; bake in greased loaf pan in moderate oven, about 45 minutes. Will keep 2 or 3 weeks.

(The old method [Fruit Cake] called for 2 eggs)

Book of new recipes which economize in eggs and other expensive ingredients mailed free on request. Address Royal Baking Powder Co., 130 William St., New York.

Royal Baking Powder is made from Cream of Tartar, derived from Grapes and adds none but healthful qualities to the food.

Forecasts for Summer Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

NOVELTY silk, organdie, crepe, batiste, embroidered voile, bordered fabric, foulards and lawn are all lovely for summer frocks, and when all has been said about styles and fashions, it is after all really the simple frock that stays longest in style, and that lends itself to each and every material.

A dainty pattern in organdie or lawn may be trimmed with a solid color in taffeta or crepe, and have a girdle or sash of the same material, or a simple belt of black velvet ribbon.

Pattern Descriptions

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH
Unless Other Price Is Stated

2040—Dress for Misses and Small Women. This style is attractive for the new organdies, lawns, and crepes, and is also nice for linen, chambray, shantung, wash silks, poplin and chiffon cloth.

Sculpture on a Large Scale

A whole army is to be carved out of a granite slope near Atlanta, Georgia, if the plans of the committee, chosen by the people of the South go through. The gigantic statuary, when completed, will be nearly two miles long, and will represent an entire fighting force. A general, from each state of the Confederacy, will be hewn there, out of the imperishable rock, and a line of standing soldiers will stretch out, life size, in imposing grandeur. Around the figures, a park of eighty acres will be laid out, and, in suitable buildings, relics and treasures of the war period will be preserved for posterity. Already, a master sculptor has been engaged and contributions are pouring in; it being estimated, that, at least, two million dollars will be needed to complete the work. Besides the actual replicas of the fighting men, there will be other sculptured representations of the Confederacy. One idea, already decided on, is to have thirteen immense columns to make a state group. It will require the services of hundreds of the highest skilled artisans to execute the magnificent design now contemplated, and as most of them will be working with heart and soul, as well as hands, the project may be said to resemble the exquisitely planned cathedral building projects of the middle ages.

MUST HAVE THREE CHILDREN.—R. J. Sprague of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, speaking before the American Genetic Association, said that if the population of this country is to be kept at the present size, every married woman will have to bring to maturity three children at least. Many poor people, according to him, have more children than they can afford, but with respect to the average middle class of Americans, he advocates "birth release" not birth control.

GLORIOUS news! The greatest news since Christ was born. Over the royal palaces of the tyrant Czars, floats the red flag of world-wide brotherhood. Just one swift jolt, and the whole rotten structure of Russian Imperialism tumbled to earth like a piece of putrid cheese. It was a glorious day for the common people the world over, but a mighty bad day for tyrants, despots and exploiters. They saw the hand of fate writing their doom on the walls of time: "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting." Kaiser Billy is trembling in his shoes, for he knows it is his turn to get the boot next. He has worked the king business for all it is worth, and has succeeded only because his subjects were taught in the cradle to look up to him as senior partner in the firm of Me und Gott, and what you are taught in the cradle is mighty hard to shake off. Billy has been able to hypnotize his seventy million subjects into believing he was necessary to their existence, and only as they worshipped him and were loyal to his house, could Germany prosper and be strong. That kind of rubbish was all right for the dark ages, but people who do their own thinking won't stand for the divine right rot in these enlightened days. Bill has been able to put his dope over because he has been a little more clever than other parasites who are engaged in the king business, and he has thrown a lot of reform bones to his docile subjects, just as bones are thrown to hungry dogs to keep them from biting and fit for fighting, but though they got the bones they were never allowed to get near the real meat of democratic self-government. The Russian revolution has immensely heartened every lover of real freedom and liberty in Germany. A socialist member in the Reichstag recently shouted: "I should be proud if there were such progress in our country as the Russian people have made. This feudal system of government must go," and he told Bethman-Hollweg that he was nothing but "a fig leaf of military absolutism," that "Prussian militarism was responsible for all the bloodshed in Europe," that "the people would not breathe freely until it was removed."

Now if the German people will only do to divine right Billy what the Russian people have done to divine right Nickey, they can have a German republic that will beat anything they ever had under the monarchy, and settled peace the world over. That kick up in Russia has been an awful jolt to our foreign-born worshippers of royal despots, many of whom want to lag behind even republican China. The Russian hated his chains, the Prussian kissed his because they were gilded, and he not only kissed them but he wanted to adorn the whole of humanity with the same brand of Hohenzollern fetters, and nearly succeeded, but we thank God the world got wise to the danger in the nick of time. If you doubt it listen to this. Six hundred office boys are drilling with broomsticks on Governor's Island, our one competent general had been relieved of his command and sent South where he can do no harm, and in a school in a Jewish district of Brooklyn, four out of several hundred scholars have actually signed a pledge of loyalty which the Mayor of New York has had circulated—the balance refused. The New Rockaway fort is adorned with pop guns that can shoot nearly half a mile, and Uncle Sam has crawled from under his bed and said he is Uncle Sham no longer. Yes, Siree! Uncle Sam is the real thing this time and the only notes he will write from now on will be hurled from the mouths of cannon. In other words we are at war, and at war with the world's most efficient and ruthless military despotism, at war in our usual happy-go-lucky style. At the present rate of recruiting we shall have an army in two hundred years—maybe. But don't worry, we'll strike our gait presently, and if the foreign language press does not object maybe we'll actually be allowed to drop the broomsticks and grab a gun. Everybody that had the vision of a blind bat knew that this war would come sooner or later, but politicians angling for hyphenate votes did not want to spring the real truth on the people. Even the most peaceful and docile nation in the world will eventually get tired of having its citizens murdered by the wholesale. We have some task before us. An army is useless without officers. It takes a year to make the poorest kind of a soldier, and it takes three or four years to make a really capable officer, for war is a science today and not a game of hammer and tongs, and it is the side that can play the game in the most scientific way that wins out. During the first eleven months of the war Russia lost sixty thousand officers, that is ten times more than all the officers we have in this country, and we have only officers enough to properly handle a force of three hundred thousand men, and not one of these men ever handled even a division of 20,000 let alone an army corps of 40,000. We are woefully short of field artillery and of heavy guns of the siege variety, without which we are helpless, we have none. Our fleet is shy thousands of officers and men. Of late years every time we commissioned a super-dreadnought (and we have only twelve to Germany's twenty) we have had to take the crews of two or three of the older battleships to man it. This means that when we put one new ship in commission we have to put three out of commission, thus making the navy weaker instead of stronger. We have been voting money lavishly for ships but made no provision to man them. Ships without men are useless, and with untrained men and no officers they are still more useless. We have had years to get ready for this crisis, and as soon as this war broke out we should have raised and drilled an army of at least two million men, built scores of destroyers and sea-going submarines. We haven't a single long distance sea-going submarine by the way, and Germany has more air men than we have soldiers on foot, and we had by the way to borrow three hundred machine guns from Great Britain before we dared even to go into Mexico. We could and should have trained thousands of aviators and if we had done that instead of acting like simpering, sissified idiots, the Lusitania would never have been sunk, and not a single American life would have been taken on the high seas or anywhere else. We were told to be neutral in thought and deed, told that this war did not concern us and a lot of other nonsense for all of which we have to pay in blood and treasure, and we should be paying for it right now with the best of our lives were not Johnny Bull's fleet keeping guard in the gray waters of the North Sea, and the men in the trenches of Northern France holding back a foe that would make these shores a shambles in a few hours but for their strong right arms. If you don't know this, we on the coast know it. Now after all our pussyfooting, simpering and shilly shallying, we have got to do our part because our weakness and our peace-at-any-price nonsense, instead of protecting us, inspired only contempt, and finally aggression. Our foes have ten million veteran soldiers in line. They have more implements of war than we can make in years. And think over this in the quiet hours of the night. The men of France, Great Britain and Italy have been ever haunted by the terrible thought of an alliance between Germany, Russia and Japan. This dire possibility has filled the thinkers of the world with a nameless dread. With Russia's limitless millions directed by German science and German genius, the Entente Rowers would have been quickly crushed, and then we should have been hit on all sides at once and crushed, too, like the shell of a rotten egg. The revolution in Russia, temporarily at least, has removed this frightful menace, but no one can tell what a day may bring forth. Russia has ninety millions of people who cannot read and her despotic ruling class will make a desperate effort to again get control. What Russia, too, has to fear is the extreme radical element, anarchists, dreamers and visionaries who want to force on the people an idealistic government which they will not be ready for a generation at least. It was this mad folly that spoiled the French revolution and made way for the insane ambitions of that military maniac, Napoleon. The whole world is in a critical condition. Now or never is the chance for democracy to assert itself and put feudal, fool kings and military despotism out of existence forever. If we could only send an army to fight side by side with those poor Russian peasants, struggling up toward liberty, what a glorious thing it would be. The stars and stripes and the red flag of brotherhood flying side by side. Ye gods what an inspiration! I have said time and again that wherever democracy needed a friend we should be on the job, and we ought to be in the middle of Europe right now auctioning off a big bunch of second-hand crowns, packing the dethroned monarchs off to St. Helena, and kicking Turkey out of Europe. This is the work God Almighty expects us to do. He gave us this vast and glorious country so we could prepare for such a job, and not lie down and rot in it like hogs. If God Almighty acts He will act only through His human instruments, and we of all people should be the ones to carry out His Divine mandates, ready to give peace, liberty and government for, of and by the people to all mankind. In this glorious task I know all Americans of German blood, especially those descended from the revolutionaries of '48, who flocked by thousands to these shores and gave us some of our best blood, will heartily cooperate. We are not fighting against, but for the German people, a people for whom we have every sympathy. Win this war, which is a holy war, a war of peoples against despots, a war of light against darkness, democracy against autocracy and the heaven on earth I have long predicted will soon be here.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers: the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My picture book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter, is Maria her Ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the picture book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie Books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

LENOX, TENN.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am sixteen years old, am black headed, dark eyes, not pretty but lazy. I weigh one hundred and fifty pounds, am five feet two inches tall. Now if any of you ever meet anyone of those dimensions you may know it is I.

Wonder where you kids will spend your vacations? I spent mine in Kentucky last year. Uncle Charlie, tell me where to spend my next one.

My father and mother are still living. I have four brothers and three sisters. One of my brothers is at the hospital at present.

Uncle Charlie, do you know a remedy for stout people to reduce their flesh? We live on a farm, raise corn, cotton, hay and hogs, have an orchard, but believe me I don't hoe cotton.

Uncle Charlie, what do you think would suit me best? I like to work when there is anything in it, but don't like to work for nothing.

RUTH RICHARDSON.

Ruth, you are much too heavy for your age and height. Fat may make you lazy, and laziness may make you fat. You can reduce your weight by hard work, exercise and dieting. If you are anxious to reduce your weight quickly, I will make arrangements to have you sent to Belgium or one or other of the warring countries, where starvation is plentiful and food scarce. As for vacations, we are not going to have any vacations in this country this year. The United States is at war, and everyone must do his or her bit either on the firing line or the food line, to keep liberty alive in the world. You children short or tall, thin or fat can all help. Get a bit of ground, dig it up and plant something. Be a food producer. Our back garden is only as big as a postage stamp, but Maria and the Goat are doing their best to see that it produces something. If we only raise enough to feed one soldier at the front for five minutes we shall feel we have done something for our country and civilization. Get that hoe out Ruth, and fight the weeds until twenty-five pounds of that superfluous tissue of yours rolls off in honest perspiration. With food at its present high price there is plenty of money for those who are willing to work and even the children on the farms ought to have their pockets lined with money this year. Uncle Sam is throwing his money broadcast, and if there is anyone in the food industry that is not getting plenty of it it must be his fault.

GREEN FOREST, ARK.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Will you welcome a little stranger to your cozy little corner? I am eleven years old, four feet seven inches tall, have brown hair and brown eyes also, and weigh seventy-one pounds. I go to Pleasant Valley school in Carroll Co., Ark. But I don't go to school now as our school was out about a month ago, and I am so lonely sometimes I hardly know what to do. I got first prize in my class for the most head marks. I have plenty to do most of the time as I live on a farm and there are plenty of rocks to pick. We live on a mountain known as the Pinnacle. We have goats, sheep, horses, cows and chickens. I am a member of the Poultry Club. And I hope Billy the goat won't get this. With best wishes to all,

Your niece, RACHEL MARTIN.

Why did your school quit doing business in the middle of winter, Rachel? If it had quit June 21, I would have understood it, but to close up a school in January, except in the Arctic regions is a crime. Better not have any schools at all than to make such a pitiful bluff at educating children, as is made in some sections of the country. We spend forty millions a year here in New York City for education, and that is more than is spent in the entire Russian Empire. We ought to get wonderful results from all that expenditure of money, but there is only one in a hundred of those who go to school, who find their way to college. I should be glad if those who live in your section will tell me why it is your school is closed? With the churches shut up six days a week, and the schools shut up sometimes six months a year, what prospects have we of ever making this a worth-while, progressive nation? Both the churches and the schools should be open all the year round. The saloon, the blind tiger, the white slave den, the poolroom, the mill and the factory are working every hour of the day all the year round, while the church and the school are asleep the best part of the time. This is all wrong. Why don't you intelligent (?) male voters alter these conditions? It is about time you did.

WITT SPRINGS, KY.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a little girl eight years old. I have brown eyes and light brown hair. I have gone to school two years. I like to go to school. I will be promoted to the third grade this year. My school will begin the first of July. I will be glad when school begins. I expect to make a teacher. Then won't that be great, Uncle, when I can be a teacher for other boys and girls? I live with my uncle, my papa's brother.

I will close for this time, with love to Uncle Charlie and the cousins, EVA FRANCES TUTTLE.

Eva, yours is a wonderful letter for a little girl of your age. What I appreciate about it is that you wrote it all by yourself, and that none of the folks helped you with it. So you are going to make a teacher are you? Good for you! The Goat wants to know whether or not you are going to make a male or female teacher. What an absurd question to ask a girl. If you're a blonde, Eva, of course the teacher will be a male brunette, with soulful dark eyes. The old Kentucky colonels always wore ferocious mustaches, you might let us know, Eva, whether you will decorate him with a soup strainer or not. Maybe you may tack on a little dinky one like that worn by Charlie Chaplin. Put plenty of muscles in his arms, Eva, so he can wallop the scholars that don't behave, and make his arm nice and long so it will reach round a lady's waist without bursting open the seams in his best Sunday Prince Albert. See that his hands are husky enough to grip a sword or a rifle so that he can fight for his country when called on to defend it. Don't let any of the pacifists get in while you are making that teacher or they will cut his hands off, so he can't fight, and they'll spoil his appearance by giving him feet that will enable him to run a thousand miles a minute every time an enemy shows himself. Please see that he has no hip pocket for if he has and if he is a genuine Kentuckian, he'll inveigle a flask of moonshine juice into it at the first opportunity when no one is looking. Leave plenty of room for his brains and see that they are of a better brand than Pop possessed or you needn't trouble to make him. With these few instructions I think you can make a pretty good teacher, and the Lord knows good teachers are badly needed. The Goat says I'm all wrong as usual. He is positive that you meant to say, you intend to study to be a teacher, instead of making a teacher. I'm so glad we've got that all straightened out. It is inspiring to think of you a little girl only eight years of age dreaming great thoughts of the time when you will be a leader of boys and girls. Work hard, have high ideals and live up to them and you may be the first woman president of the United States. Now just think of that! There is something to strive for and only as we set ourselves big tasks to do and golden goals to attain is life worth while.

DUNDAS, VA.

MY DEAREST UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a girl fifteen years old. I am asking for information. I feel sure you will write me something on this subject and I know you can. The subject is; Resolved: That the average young man of today has greater opportunities to make life a success financially than his forefathers. I would like for you to send me some of your best points on the negative and send through the mail, and if possible send it so that it may arrive at Dundas by Wednesday the fourteenth. I have read and heard so much of you that I don't feel a stranger to you at all. I am a girl that wants to learn all I possibly can with the few opportunities I have so that I may be successful in all my undertaking. I will appreciate anything you may send and all thanks for them.

BEULAH RANEY.

The average man with little or no capital and less brains is not wanted under the present economic regime, except as a wage earner. He must either go up into the millionaire class or down into the wage-earning class, for the middle class is doomed. The day of individualism is drawing to a close and the era of collective effort is at hand. To discuss however, the subject outlined by you, Beulah, would take a whole edition of COMFORT, and it is a subject that had better be shelved for the present, as the war has brought about conditions that are abnormal, and even a blind monkey can get a good job and make more money today than a banker could fifty years ago. The prosperity we are enjoying, however, is purely artificial. Before the war boosted our industries and the Allies began to throw gold by the bucketful into this country, the soup kitchen was the most familiar object in the land, and bundle days, when people handed out rags to the unemployed, were only too frequent. Just what will happen when the war is over no one can tell. There may be a frightful slump, and again there may not be. A big section of Europe will need rebuilding. Machinery has been exhausted and worn out, but thirty million fighting men, when they return to the factories, may be able to do nearly all the reconstruction work without our aid, though they will want our raw materials. There will likely be an era of rigid economy to make up for the lavish expenditures of war. There will, in all probability, be a tremendous slump in wages in this country at least, and probably in all other countries as well. There will be an era of change and readjustment, both political and economic. One thing however is certain. Those who have fought and bled are not going back to their homes to submit to the old starvation regime. Wealth will have to circulate freely through all the veins of

Nerine ran lightly down the stairs, her fingertips on the broad banisters. What a banister to slide on of a wet day!

Breakfast was in a small, sunny room, and there was no one there but Lady Belton; Sir William had been out and away long ago; the younger children were profiting by Miss Bruce's absence to breakfast in the schoolroom with carelessness and riot. Poor Lady Belton received Nerine's message with a downcast shake of the head.

"I knew it!" dismally. "Will you take tea or coffee? You will find those kidneys nice, I think; or will you have some of that grill? Kitty is always so susceptible, and I knew she would take cold, for she sat talking to her father in that foolishly thin tea-gown until all hours. And the schoolroom maid tells me that Miss Bruce seems very feverish and wretched, so that I have sent off for the doctor at once. It is too bad, my dear, that Kitty has been so imprudent. I am afraid you will have a dull day."

"I wonder," said Nerine, hesitatingly, "if Kitty stays in bed, and you do not want me for anything, if you would let me teach the children a little."

Lady Belton's face brightened as she looked up from her letters and her toast. The children had been spending the past two or . ree mornings under her auspices and had been a woe and an affliction.

"You would not like it, really? I am afraid," with unwilling candor, "that you would find them a little trying."

"Perhaps they might not like being handed over to me," cheerfully, "but if you would let me pay them a visit and see how we get on ——"

"Really, it is too good-natured of you." Lady Belton spoke more gratefully than she knew. "I will take you to the schoolroom by and by, when I have seen Kit—and the doctor. But I warn you, my dear Nerine, that you are undertaking a good deal."

She rose as she spoke, for the doctor's carriage could be seen grinding up the steep avenue.

"Finish your breakfast and I will come back for you."

Nerine was left alone with her half-finished breakfast and a pile of London papers.

"I wonder"—she said it aloud, getting up to refill her teacup—"what those children are like! They are evidently naughty, but they can't be any worse than I used to be!"

"Why, were you bad?" The unexpected voice made her jump. There was no one to be seen, but as she turned sharply round she saw there was a second door to the room. It was slightly ajar, and through the crack shone one large, bright eye.

Nerine laughed.

"How long have you been there? And why don't you come in?"

The eye disappeared, then the door slowly opened and a young person in a short frock and spotless pinafore appeared.

"Are you Joan?" Nerine asked, and the child nodded.

"I came to see mother, but she's not here. Has she had her breakfast?" the child asked, shyly.

"Yes. Have you?"

"Oh, some of it! I thought I might as well come down and have some of your marmalade," affably. "Can I sit in mother's place?"

"Where is your sister?"

"May? Oh, she went to feed the rabbits. Do you like rabbits?"

"I never saw any."

Joan's eyes opened perilously wide. This was beyond her imagination. Fancy a grown-up person who had never seen rabbits! She felt it must be sad to be so ignorant, and gracefully changed the subject.

"This is my rat," she remarked, calmly, and diving into the capacious front of her pinafore, she pulled out a most villainous-looking animal of a dingy white color, and set it down on the table.

Miss Nerine Lispenard repressed with some difficulty a start of horror as the rat advanced straight toward her.

"He is a beautiful rat," she said, politely. "Will he—will he come when you call him?" she asked, with haste and some strategy.

"Not if he smells bacon. There is a piece on your plate that would be nice for him."

Nerine held out the bacon on her fork, and, while it was being nibbled by the unwelcome animal, courageously stroked him.

Joan's eyes kindled.

"He thinks you are nice," she said after a moment of hesitation on the rat's part as to biting. "If mother or Kitty were to touch him, he would bite them in a minute," she proudly added.

"Don't you think he wants washing?" Miss Lispenard surveyed the grimy beast with inward distaste.

"Oh, yes. But he ran away for a week once when I tried it. Tommy, Tommy, Tommy!" And Tommy whisked across the table and was pushed hastily into his old hiding place.

"I hear mother coming, and Tommy will chase her." She firmly held down her treasure as her mother entered.

"What, Joan, you here?" casting herself down on the first convenient chair and looking quite despairing. "Fancy, Nerine, the doctor assures me that Miss Bruce is certainly ill with scarlatina, and that he thinks it very likely that Kitty will develop it, as she seems so feverish. And I suppose that if I do not send May and Joan off to the seaside, they will get it, and that would mean missing the best part of my season in town. For, of course, if they were ill I couldn't leave."

"We hate the seaside." Joan's voice sounded very calm after her mother's. "We would rather stay at home and have scarlatina and eat jelly."

"I am afraid you must go, dear. And as for you, Nerine, I don't know what to say. I don't want to send you home, but I certainly should not like you to have this wretched malady."

"I don't think I should take it," with well-measured cheerfulness. "I am not a bit nervous." Better to have scarlatina for a year than to return to Lispenard House. "But of course, if I did, I should be a nuisance to you, and perhaps you would rather I went home at once."

In spite of herself her voice was a little husky. It was such a terrible disappointment to have to go home and face her own thoughts and her stepfather's company. It would be too, too lonely.

Joan looked at her mother.

"I will go to the seaside if she will come too," pointing a sticky finger at Nerine. "But I won't go with only May and nurse, and May won't go with only me and nurse; it's too dull."

"Would you go with them? Would it bore you terribly?" Poor Lady Belton was an abject slave to her youngest daughter, but even so she felt qualms about asking her guest to retire to a tiny village in the society of two children and a nurse.

"Certainly I would go, unless you want me here to nurse Kitty." Nerine spoke quite joyfully: anything would be so much better than returning to Lispenard House. "I could give them lessons in the morning, if you liked," with a laughing glance at Joan, who, strangely enough, said nothing.

"You are a dear girl to be so kind." Lady Belton looked mightily relieved, for the children were accustomed to ride rough-shod over their old nurse, but Nerine would be able to manage them. "I should feel so much happier if I knew you were there, to go about with them," she said gratefully. "I know you would not allow them to get drowned or run over."

"We are too old for that—eh, Joan?" the girl said, laughing. "I suppose I had better go upstairs and pack my things again."

"My maid will do that. But are you sure"—with a kindly detaining hand on her arm—"that you do not mind going?"

Nerine's lip trembled.

"I would so much rather than go back to Mr. Mayne," she said quickly, and went out of the room with some haste.

"Poor child!" Lady Belton thought, "to prefer a dreary sojourn with nurse and children to going home." She drew Joan to her, happily unconscious of the white rat.

"Why do you want her to go with you, dear? Just because you like her?"

Joan wriggled hastily away for fear of accidents.

"Because she likes my Tommy," she said firmly.

Lady Belton went cheerfully off to give orders about the packing. Never in all her days had she found any one who had made their way to Joan's heart by liking Tommy.

CHAPTER XVIII.

TOMMY IN HARD LUCK.

"Now, Miss May and Miss Joan," briskly, "we shall be at Combe in five minutes. Best tie your feather collars on and be quite ready to get out." And the nurse, who was stout, and of a smiling countenance, began to gather up the many stray belongings of her charges.

"Where are you going, May? Far from the station?"

Nerine looked up from her book as the children bounced excitedly over her feet. How funny it was to be going, she did not know where, with two children, she had never seen till today. She wondered what the farmhouse to which they were destined was like; she had never been in a farmhouse.

"It's not far when you ride."

"They have such a fat horse, but he hurries."

Both children spoke at once, and Joan clutched the covered basket which contained the cherished Tommy, while she gazed out of the carriage window.

"It's about a mile, Miss Lispenard," nurse said, respectfully, for she admired immensely the tall young lady who had "a way with her" which could awe Miss Joan into keeping the hated rat in his covered basket. "My lady said

The Kingdom of Our Birthright

In running this series we are not advocating belief in astrology or faith in the pretended talismanic charm of birth-stones, although these beliefs have persisted from remote antiquity and have not a few devotees even in this present age of reason. Yet as myths and superstitions that have dominated through the ages they possess historic interest and educational value. Miss July will appear with a pleasing message next month.—EDITOR.

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THE sign of Cancer rules from June 21st to July 22nd, and its power pertains especially to the principles of domestic life. When both father and mother are born under this influence, family ties may be very strong; the wife will be dearer than the bride, and the husband nobler than the lover. The sweet heritage of children will make the home a center of all joys. Southey in his search for reason of things, says: "A house is never perfectly furnished for enjoyment unless there is a child in it rising three years, and a kitten rising six weeks."

Parents will show no favoritism among the children, will give good example, and try to teach prudence and forethought in all things. Economy and industry will mark their efforts, that the children may enjoy educationaal privileges, and to make old age secure for themselves. Although the ever kind and sympathetic parent, the father love may be hidden behind authority, or its expression crowded out by t close application to business, thus bringing the children into closer relations with the mother, who will exhibit rare patience with their mistakes, their understanding, and their progress. Her lot may be very hard, for she will not shrink from sacrifice to her great, unselfish love for her children, in whom she can see no flaw. How wonderful are "Mother Eyes."

Mother Eyes

Could some famed scientist but analyze
The occult power that rests in Mother Eyes;
Could he equip each mortal with this sight
That looks through all the wrong and sees the right—

Perhaps the world would find that many a knave
Beneath his rascal's skin is true and brave,
And many a scoundrel, hated and reviled,
To this strange sight is but an errant child.

Oh, gentle-reader, Mother Eyes that dimly scan
A vacillating wreck—and see a man,
If this be blindness, then your God is true,
For all your pain he is rewarding you.
—William A. McGarry, in Life.

Children born under this sign of the zodiac are very sensitive, and will cry and struggle when put into the arms of a repulsive person. Every mother has had this experience with her children, but few understand its seriousness. The child should be the judge, and a repetition of the incident prevented. In matters of education they are very persistent, and the daughters incline to literature, while the sons to the manufacturing and trading sphere of life.

June Birth-stone is the Agate for Health and Long Life

As the agate symbolizes health and long life, so may being temperate in all things be called its key, so much does it have to do with a sound mind and body. Eating sparingly of simple food, cultivating regular habits, spending all the recreation hours out of doors, and keeping cheerful, are the best health producers given us, and yet least heeded, because they belong to the common events of life.

Life is a service, and if lived prudently and honorably, the advancing years will come naturally and without fear. The glint will die from the hair, the feet will lose their spring, and the roses fade from the cheeks, but if a face is marked by a long life beautifully lived, with senses unimpaired, youth realizes there is compensation for each year gone from life, and that if the heart and spirits be kept warm, the years will not count, though the body is old.

New dressed and happy appears Miss June in her bridal veil, as if to ask the blessings of health and a long life. "All the world loves a bride" is a true saying, and June in her garb of leaves and roses makes all the world seem hopeful, and a very fitting time to make a new beginning of life; a new starting point for happiness and usefulness.

If read aright, there is a very pretty thought in the old legend, that in ancient Boeotia brides were carried home in vehicles whose wheels were burned at the door, in token that they would never again be needed.

How to Make Miss June

A doll, artificial or fresh flowers, white crepe paper, white lace paper, a paper doiley and white netting are used to make Miss June. Make a full skirt with long train from the white crepe paper and shape an over-dress from lace paper. To the paper doiley attach common white net to represent the veil. Use white roses around the head and arrange a large bouquet for the right arm.

Stop Corn Pain! Corns Lift Out With Fingers

Few Drops Takes Soreness From Corns and Calluses and They Lift Off.

A noted Cincinnati chemist discovered a new ether compound and called it freezone and it now can be had in tiny bottles as here shown for a few cents from any drug store.

You simply apply a few drops of freezone upon a tender corn or painful callus and instantly the soreness disappears, then shortly you will find the corn or callus so loose that you can just lift it off with the fingers.

No pain, not a bit of soreness, either when applying freezone or afterwards and it doesn't even irritate skin.

Hard corns, soft corns or corns between the toes, also toughened calluses just shrivel up and lift off so easy. It is wonderful! Seems magical. It works like a charm. If your druggist doesn't have freezone tell him to order a small bottle for you from any wholesale house. Edward Wesley Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

For Our Young Mothers

SO many of my girls seem to be young mothers, anxious to learn the things they should and should not do that the small daughters may grow up sweet and fair to look upon, that I thought, this month, they deserved a little talk all their own.

No matter how young your small Betty or Patty is, now is the time to begin to decide what she shall look like when she enters young womanhood. Hair, complexion, hands, figure, facial expression, all are more or less within your power to mold and determine.

Take the complexion, for instance. If you will see that Betty forms regular habits of the bowels; that she does not eat between meals, that her foods are well chosen, with plenty of fruits; that she drinks four or five glasses of water a day, is given an entire body bath each night and a sponge bath each morning; that she sleeps in a room with open windows and is encouraged to healthy exercise—you can rest easy in your mind. She will have a perfect complexion, sparkling eyes and radiant vitality.

JUMPING ROPE EXERCISES LUNGS, ARMS AND LEGS.

The regularity of the bowels may be established by insisting on a regular hour each day—say, thirty minutes after breakfast, and again at night. They will automatically take care of themselves if this habit is formed. Betty can be taught to take her own bath as early as six years old, to wash out her own tub, hang up her towels and washcloth, and see to the whole undertaking herself. I know, for I have a friend with a six-year-old son who successfully superintends every detail of his own toilet.

As to exercise, healthful play is the wisest way to secure it for very young children. See that there is enough variety in the play to exercise legs, arms, waist and promote deep breathing. Jumping rope at a mild rate of speed and for, say, only a count of ten or fifteen at a time, is healthful—it exercises legs, arms, lungs, and stimulates the circulation and elimination—though prolonged and over-vigorous jumping is injurious. Rolling the hoop means reaching, stretching, making sudden movements, and, of course, running—all good forms of exercise. It trains the eye, as well as the muscles. Roller skating is another good form of exercise.

The hair, needs gentle persistent brushing for forty or fifty strokes, at least once daily. It must not be allowed to hang loose in the neck or it will spoil the line of the nape of the neck by training the hair to grow too low. It must not be brushed back too severely from the forehead, but, on the contrary, thought should be given to training it to lie in the manner which gives the best line to the forehead.

The hair should be shampooed once in two weeks unless hair is very dry, when once in three weeks will be sufficient. The scalp must be kept loose from the skull by gentle massage with the fingers a few minutes nightly at bedtime. The parting of the hair should be changed from time to time to prevent hair habits being formed, and also that the part may not wear too wide.

The eyebrows should be brushed and shaped daily with an eyebrow brush (like a very small child's tooth-brush). Arch a trifle.

See that Betty's teeth are brushed before and after meals, on rising and before going to bed, and be sure to use dental floss between the teeth.

Care for the nails scrupulously, pushing the cuticle at base of nail back each time the hands are washed, shaping nail with file, and cleaning thoroughly.

Watch all habitual positions, and see that Betty's shoulders are kept straight, that her toes point straight ahead and do not turn out, and that she holds her chin well up.

Do all this, and some day she will rise up and call you blessed!

Answers to Questions

Discouraged Girl.—Of course at eighteen your hands should not be wrinkled and dry and your knuckles prominent, nor the skin red. The big trouble is that your body lacks certain elements of nourishment and that your circulation is poor. The fact that your hands are white in the morning, sometimes, and then persistently red the rest of the day, indicates this. You are not drinking enough water, and your food is not well selected. I have said so many times to all of my girls that they must drink eight to ten glasses of water a day that it hardly seems necessary to repeat it, yet I find I have to keep on saying it. So make up your mind that not a day shall pass that you do not get eight glasses of water. Next, you must eat as many green vegetables and fresh fruits as you can. You are probably eating too concentrated a diet—perhaps too many salt meats, perhaps hardly any vegetables, perhaps no fresh fruits, I can't tell at this distance, yet I know that something of this kind is the matter. You must give your body the kind of foods that will make your skin soft—set the little sebaceous glands to working. Do you know what they are?—little glands beneath the skin, that keep it oiled and soft. Yours are sluggish—perhaps you do not give the body material to make the oil, and perhaps you do not exercise enough to keep the little glands stirred up to do their work. Take a body bath every night or morning—the ideal thing is to take a hot or warm bath at night just before going to bed, and sponge the body off with cool water in the morning. This stimulates the skin, opens the pores and removes all clogging material. Then you should take a long, brisk walk every day, and you should have some sort of outdoor exercise in addition—working in your flower garden, playing tennis, rowing, swimming, bicycling. Find something that uses every muscle and gets you tired. Eat vegetables and fruits, meat only once a day, and chew every particle of food until it is fluid before swallowing. Don't eat between meals, and avoid too many sweet things. Drink milk, eat cream on your cereals if you have it, and have a light breakfast—nothing but fruit, cereal and cream, and toast—as for instance, baked apple or orange or grapefruit or some stewed dried apricots (which have been soaked over night before cooking slowly for two hours) or some apple sauce or some stewed prunes (fixed same way as the apricots) or some berries or a peach, etc. For the cereal, any of the uncooked cereals, or oatmeal which has been cooked a long time, or any other cooked cereal, being careful that the latter has been well cooked. Try all this and let me know how you get along.

G. F. F.—Yes, I should drop out coffee if I were you. Be more careful of your diet, if your stomach is weak. Do not give it hard things to digest. You see, some foods take several hours to digest and others only a short time, and of course if you work a weak stomach too much it rebels, so give it the easiest foods. A milk diet, with no solid food, would be a good thing for you, as it is hardly any work for the stomach, and yet furnishes more nourishment than ordinary food. But if you do not want to do this, be sure not to eat hot breads or biscuits, griddle cakes, pork in any form, veal, pies or cakes. All of these are hard of digestion. Lean broiled or roasted beef, lamb or mutton, not too well done, will be all right for you, but not too much and never more than once a day. Vegetables and fruits are the easiest things for you. Do not eat fried foods, as they are hard to digest. Be careful of these things and your stomach will not trouble you so much. The pores of your skin are large, you say. Give the face a brisk rubbing with a soft cloth, after washing, and do not use too hot water on it. Always rinse in warm water a couple of times, then in cool, and finally in cold. This helps to close the pores. But they must be clean, first, or you will have blackheads or pimples. Better get yourself a camel's-hair complexion brush and use it. The ammonia to be used for removing superfluous hair is the ordinary household ammonia.

Marie F.—I should judge your bowels were not in good order. Your backache might come from that, and when you say your skin is yellow at times, that shows that your digestion is not what it should be. Read what I say to "G. F. F.," and take particular pains to see that your bowels move freely once a day. If you will eat plenty of fruits and vegetables, and drink lots of water, your bowels will probably become normal without any more effort, since you are only seventeen. Just to begin with, you might get a small bottle of aromatic spirits of cascara at your drug-store and take a teaspoonful for one night. After that, see that foods and water take care of the situation. This will affect your figure also. Constipated bowels make the figure look heavy below the waist. Also be careful in putting on your corset, if you wear a corset. These days a great many women do not wear corsets, thinking it better for the figure. You should unlace your corset before taking it off at night—that is, untie it and loosen the strings very widely. In the morning, slip it on and fasten it up in front, and fasten the side garters to the stockings before lacing the corset in the back. Settle it easily at the waistline before lacing. You should put your strings in the corset in such a way that you can tie them near the bottom of the corset, and again at the waist. The way to do this is to lace naturally for three or four holes from the bottom—depending on the length of the corset—and then instead of crossing over with either string, put each in the hole just above where it last came out, and leave a loop hanging, then lacing across as before till waist is reached, when make another loop as before and lace to top. Or, rather, the best way is to begin at top, putting the middle of your string there, and starting each side with one half of the string, making a loop at the waist and again at the hips, and finally tying the ends of the string at the very bottom of the corset. In lacing your corset when it is on, draw the strings at the hips and tie first, pulling down, never up toward waist, then draw the strings until you reach the waist, and tie there, drawing from above as well as from below. You may be putting on your corset all laced up and so pushing your figure down as you fasten the corset, thus making yourself larger below the waist than you should be. There is a lot to putting on a corset, and at seventeen it is not a bad thing to leave it off altogether. Better, also, practise all the arm exercises you find in this column—this will develop the upper part of your body. Your hair, you say, is thin. It would be if your bowels and stomach were not in good order. You can't have healthy hair if the body isn't in perfect condition, so get to work to make it so. In the meantime shampoo once in three weeks, and rinse very thoroughly after each shampoo, over and over again. Brush the hair gently every night for one hundred strokes.

Thule.—If your hair "sours" one day after shampooing, I should judge you did not get it thoroughly dry before doing up. How about it? Rinse in many, many waters, as if any soap is left on scalp or hair it will cause dandruff. Then dry the hair thoroughly in the sun, letting it hang loose and lifting and shaking it so the air gets to every portion, and the sun, too. It should be "bone-dry" and warm to the touch before you put it up. Once a week is too often to wash your hair. Once in two weeks, if your hair is oily, is about right. The night before shampooing, soak the scalp in olive oil and do up in a towel. Let stand till the morning, when you shampoo. This will loosen the dandruff and help to detach it from the scalp. You must rub the scalp thoroughly while shampooing. Make a soap jelly, dissolving half a cake of shaved white soap in a quart of boiling water and keeping it over a flame until all dissolved. Let slightly cool, then dampen the hair and scalp with plain water, and pour on this soap liquid, rubbing it into every part of the scalp over and over. Go at your scalp as if you were rubbing hard on a washing board! Rinse out thoroughly, then use another supply of the soap liquid and rub again. Finally rinse in half a dozen or more waters. You can't rinse too much. Do not let your hair stay done up at night? That is almost sure to produce dandruff. Take it down, always, loosen it, shake it by the open window, then brush for one hundred strokes, and either go to bed with the hair entirely loose, or braided, without tying, in extremely loose braids. Take care of your general health and your diet, for these will also affect the condition of your hair. Better read what I have said to other members of our club this month about this.

An Old Subscriber.—The best way to make the eyes sparkle is to keep the body in good condition and also have plenty of sleep. Wash the eyes out once a day with a four per cent solution of boric acid. But, most of all, see that the bowels move freely every day. Milk that has had the butter taken out of it will not produce flesh. Its fat producing qualities have gone into the butter. It is a healthful drink, however, as it destroys many disease germs. To soften hard water, add powdered borax to it, or a few drops of tincture of benzoin. The latter will make the water milky in color and soften it. Why not boil some bran on the stove and use the bran water to wash your hands? It is excellent. Or you can make some small bags of rolled oats, about two or three inches, partly full of the oats, and use these to wash with—a fresh one each time—they are softening to the skin. For your dishes use a dish mop, to keep your hands out of the water as much as possible, and you can, if you like, use rubber gloves when your work requires your putting your hands in water, or the ordinary white gloves that are called "garden gloves" or "workmen's gloves." These can be washed and kept always fresh, while protecting your hands from all things dirty.

Dollie Bell.—No, one hundred and seventeen pounds is not too much for sixteen years old, five feet two. You could weigh one hundred and twenty-five. The blackheads can be gotten rid of by scrubbing nightly with a complexion brush (camel's-hair) and hot soapy water, and rinsing thoroughly. Your last rinsing should always be of cold water to close the pores. Be sure to exercise freely every day—outdoor exercise, I mean. That is the best way to keep the pores open and help them to throw off the little impurities which, if allowed to remain, will cause blackheads. About your hands, see my answer to "Discouraged Girl." In New York, the daughters of many of the most fashionable families still wear their hair in braids at sixteen, so if you want to do so you would be right in line with the best customs. If you want to do it up, I should part it in the middle, and also again just behind the ears, so that your front hair will be in two sections. Comb your back hair half way up your head and tie firmly with a bit of narrow shoestring. Now twist this hair into a rope, rather tight, and loop it once, letting the loop stand out from the head, and winding the hair around the base of the loop in a smooth coil. This will be a Psyche knot. Then take one half of your front hair and roll it away from the face, beginning just above the ears. Bring the end around your coil, and do the same with the other side. A prettier way is to part the hair from the forehead to the neck. Comb each side up and toward the ear, holding the strand just behind the ear, and braid. Bring one braid across to where the other braid starts, and tie with a big bow of ribbon. Then bring the second braid over to where the first started and tie there with a bow. This is a simple and pretty way of doing the hair. You can roll the hair slightly away from the forehead, not drawing it back too tight, before braiding, if you desire.

Mrs. S. R.—I am so sorry you have been delayed in getting an answer to your question. You see the magazine is printed so long in advance, and there are so many letters to answer that it always takes a little time before an answer can be printed. It is against the rules of the department to answer letters by mail. I was much interested in your letter. Yes, I think the milk diet would help you, because milk is easy to digest when taken without solid foods. You say your liver is out of order. You should exercise for this, and you should cut out all foods which overwork it. Cut out sweets and fats, for these tax the liver. If you will read what I said to "G. F. F.," the directions will apply to you as well. If I were you I should drink a glass of cool water before breakfast, containing the juice of half a lemon. This is good for the liver, but exercise is best of all. I am sorry you are having such a nervous time, but if you can get your stomach, bowels and liver to behaving, it will make everything easier for you. At the time of the "change," the body is very much disturbed, and the stomach finds it hard to digest anything but very simple foods, in many cases. So keep this in mind. Eat cereals and cream, fruits, toast, vegetables. Drink milk, lots of water. See to the bowels—this is most important. Warm baths at night will help to relieve your nervousness, probably. And be as cheerful as you can, for this is a passing phase. Here is an exercise for your liver:

To Stimulate the Liver

Sitting in a chair, with feet firmly planted on the ground, chin up, chest out, and hands on hips, turn the body at the waist as far to the left as possible, then as far to the right. Continue for fifteen or twenty times. Then stand erect, heels a few inches apart, hands above head, palms meeting, elbows perfectly straight, shoulders back. Without bending knees, throw arms out and down and back between the knees as far as they can go. Bend at waist only, do not bend knees. Practise for a few minutes at a time.

Another Exercise

Lying on back on bed, raise right leg without bending knee until it is as near at right angles with the body as you can get it. Then lower gradually, the slower the better, being careful to keep leg stiff. Repeat five or six times, then do the same with the left leg, then with both. This is good for the liver and for constipation, as well as for reducing a too fat abdomen.

NEBRASKA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for several years and think it is the best paper that comes to our home.

We live just west of the great Missouri river. To the east is level land and on the west it is rolling and finally hilly. We raise great quantities of corn, wheat, oats and potatoes. Our grains are fed mostly to cattle and hogs as also is the hay, clover or Alfalfa, which grows in abundance. We never have what is known as a complete failure of crops. Sometimes we have too much rain, very often not enough, but we always make good one or more of the products, especially Alfalfa.

We have some very fine cities and towns in this state. Omaha is the largest city. It is known for its stockyards. About the cleanest little city is Wayne. It is one hundred and twenty-five miles from Omaha, and noted for its fine schools and churches.

In regard to Georgie's letter I will say a few things about country life. I was raised on a farm and actually believe it to be the place God provided for the raising of our boys and girls. Why? Because of its wholesome fresh air, its quietness and its beauty. With our beautiful groves we have so much more space for them to play in. Is not that more tempting than the cement sidewalks where so many of your girls and boys play? You may say, "Send them to the parks where amusement is provided for children." That is all very well, but what mother can send her child off to play at the park without the fear of its getting hurt or coming in contact with some dread disease.

Our Nebraska schools are of the very best. We employ competent teachers and our children are trained almost as well as those of the city. In several places we have consolidated schools where we employ several experienced teachers. Here they teach manual training, domestic science or anything you desire the children to take up.

Georgie, if you could only be out on the farm one morning in the beautiful springtime and at sunrise hear the song of the birds, the echoes and inhale the fragrance which the soft breezes carry from the clover and Alfalfa fields, I am sure you would say, "No more city life for me."

We have our automobiles with which we go to the city when we desire a few days of such life, but we are always glad to get back to the good, old quiet home in the country.

Where do the young men of the city spend their evenings? Mostly in the poolrooms, bowling alleys, saloons or theater. What mother would not rather have her son on the farm than in such places? The farm boys and girls are more willing to stay home evenings and if they do go away we generally know where they are and when they come home. When a young lady comes from the city to visit a country friend she soon upsets things. The boys become infatuated over her and nine times out of ten she has spoiled all the country girls she has come in contact with. They become dissatisfied at home and finally go to the city where they are misled by some city friend and lost to home and character. When a city chap wants a good girl for a wife, he generally goes to the country for her. Many homes have been shattered when a country boy has married a city girl and she was not able and too classy to try to do the duties of a farmer's wife.

I hope I have hurt no one's feelings as I only want to convince Georgie that country life is miles ahead of city life.

I am five feet two inches tall and weigh one hundred and two pounds. Have brown eyes and long black hair. I am quite strong and keep up my end of the farming as best I can.

Wishing everyone good luck and prosperity, I am,
Brown Eyes.

PEARCY, ARK.

DEAR COMFORT READERS:

If Mrs. Wilkinson will allow me space I would like to ask a favor. Will any of the COMFORT readers who have made a success selling song poems (or lyrics) please write to me telling me how they managed their work to obtain success?

I have composed several song poems and have sent some of them to music publishers who advertised for song poems and I always receive the reply that my work is fine and if I will send them a fee—which is from twenty-five to fifty dollars—to pay for setting my song to music and having it copyrighted they will sell it for me. I know that a lyric must be set to music and copyrighted to be of any value. I hope some COMFORT friend that has had experience will write to me and give me advice.

I have been an invalid nearly twelve years. I spend my time reading, writing and crocheting. I try to earn money selling crochet work but find this slow for the market is always crowded.

I would like to receive letters from all who care to write. I am interested in the West and would like letters describing home life, traveling, or in fact, any will be interesting. I will answer all who enclose postage but cannot otherwise. Would also be pleased with quilt pieces or any token of remembrance.

Best wishes to all, MISS FANNIE STICKLIN.

Miss Sticklin. It sounds very pessimistic and dog-in-the-mangerish of me, I know, but nevertheless my advice to you in regard to writing song poems is—don't do it. Or, at least, don't give publishers the fee they demand. True, some win fame and fortune but for one song that makes a hit there are hundreds that are utter failures. I don't want to discourage you, for you may have real talent, but I do say—beware!—Ed.

CHUCKEY, TENN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

May I come in for a short chat? I am every inch a Tar Heel. I was born in North Carolina, but my parents came to Tenn. seven years ago. It is a fine state but North Carolina can't be beaten.

I was glad to read such a cheerful letter from Mattie Mae Clark. She certainly is a dear and one of my most loved childhood chums.

I wonder how many of the sisters think life is what we make it? I do. Does not the cheerful woman make a cheerful world just as the sorrowing woman makes a gloomy world. The eye maketh that which it looks upon. The ear maketh its own melodies or discords. The world without reflects the world within. The cold-hearted may expect to be treated with coldness and the proud with haughtiness; those who forget the rights of others must not be surprised if their own are forgotten. How many does a lovely example win to goodness? There are no trials which we may not transform

All at once he drew his rein.

"Put up your hands!" she ordered.

The heavy pistols dropped to the desert sand.

THE Widow Jefferson, proprietress of the Halfway House between Mordaunt and Prairieton, had just discharged the last of her servants.

"I'm sorry," she told the Mexican woman, who still lingered by the doorstep. "You know the circumstances as well as I. Trade has fallen away to almost nothing. So few pass this way now."

"But the senora will be lonely!" with wide-open eyes. "I will stay without wages, senora!"

"I thank you for that," Mrs. Jefferson replied, "but I cannot allow you to do it. It wouldn't be fair to you."

Dolores shrugged her fat shoulders as Mexicans are forever shrugging their shoulders, took up her small bundle of clothing and went. The Widow Jefferson sighed. She had liked Dolores.

The remainder of the day dragged heavily to this young woman who was braving the dangers of the borderland in order that she might support herself and her child. When she went to bed that night a big revolver of an old-fashioned frontier type and a Winchester rifle lay within easy reach of her hands. These weapons had belonged to her husband, Bowers Jefferson the Ranger, one-time terror to border thieves, and to the woman's mind his more than dauntless spirit still hovered about them. He had known, none better, how to shoot true and fast, and he had taught her to shoot true and fast. She knew that she could handle firearms better than most men. Thus assured, she fell aleep.

The sun was shining through a rent high in the adobe wall at the head of her bed when she awoke. Turning her head slowly, she looked tenderly upon the sleeping, dimpled face of her son; with gentle fingers she swept back a wayward curl that had strayed down over one of the tender-lidded, baby-blue eyes.

"Poor little boy," she murmured; and, as though he heard her voice, the child moved closer to her. "Poor little boy. You've got only a dog and a kitten—and a mother. You ought to go to school next year. If I had as much as a thousand dollars, I'd take you East, where there are schools. I'd open a restaurant, or something. I'd make it support us * * * *"

Slowly the red sun climbed higher and higher in its pale-blue sky and threw its shimmering rays over the vast dry plains like the blasts of a furnace. The mesquit, that chaplet of the desert, wrinkled its alkali-covered leaves as though in pain; the hot sand sparkled; the dim haze trembled in the purple distances; the coyotes, scavengers of the endless reaches, hid their lank bodies in their deepest lairs. Mrs. Jefferson went about her duties, as usual, trying to sing, as usual. But the songs wouldn't come. There was no melody in her heart; in her heart there was nothing save the vivid recollection of that bitter day, now exactly five years gone, when four cowmen had brought her Ranger husband home from the Rio Grande. She remembered so well the two blue-rimmed bullet holes in his breast, the waxen face, the bloodless lips that could speak to her no more. It had been a Gethsemane * * * * A band of greasers had waylaid him.

On the front doorstep the child Bowers, named for his father, played with his year-old Mexican dog and his striped kitten. Suddenly the boy rose and looked down the long, hot streak that was the old stage road. A moment later he turned to his mother with an exclamation:

"Dust!"

Dust! Everything, thought the lone and lonely woman, was indeed dust. There was nothing left to her but dust. Life was all dust now.

"Mother, look!" cried the boy.

"I wonder," muttered Mrs. Jefferson, as one waking from a dream. She hastened to the doorway. Standing there, she shaded her eyes with her hand and looked westward over the alkali-lined road.

"It's a man on horseback," she finally said.

The rider approached swiftly. The woman, watching with only ordinary interest, saw a youngish man, who was attired in the common clothing of the West and armed well, gallop a fire-breathing broncho up and past. All at once he drew his rein; then he spoke to his mount, turned and rode back to the Halfway House.

"I'm a horned toad," he declared, smiling, "if I knowed there was a stoppin'-place this side o' Mordaunt! I'm half starved, ma'am. Can you accommodate me to a dinner? I'm not partic'lar what it is, ma'am. Even a baked house cat'd go fine with me about now!"

"I'll have dinner for you in thirty minutes," quietly said Mrs. Jefferson. "There is a barn behind the house; you'll find something for your horse there; and just below it is the one spring in the county. When you come back, take a chair in this room." She pointed to a doorway at her left.

"And how about a drink?" inquired the newcomer, while he twisted at a small blonde mustache.

"Water," said the woman, frowning. "I don't handle spirits."

"Water!" laughed the stranger. "Whoop-ee! I always thought water was for cows and to wash in! But I guess it's better'n nothin'."

The widow was making headway with a quick meal when her guest returned from the barn. She sighed as she noted that her supply of food was all too scant; but strong, strapping men were not usually hard to please in their eating, she knew.

The stranger had taken Bowers the second to his lap and was talking to him—evidently in a manner highly pleasing to the boy, for the dimpled face was all interest. Suddenly Bowers sprang from the big knees to the floor and brought an old guitar, one that Dolores had left. With a satisfied look the big brown man took the battered instrument and struck several chords readily. Then he began to lilt a rollicking Spanish buccaneer song for the pleasure of his youthful listener.

Mrs. Jefferson stopped her work and listened. It was a good voice, a rich voice. She found herself wondering—where had she seen that strong, yet boyish, face before? She stole to the room adjoining that from which came the song, and took a slightly yellowed newspaper from behind a picture frame. Opening the faded sheet, she spread it out on a little table and saw a likeness—all but the small blonde mustache—of that same stranger's face. Under the picture was a sentence that cried out that he was a fugitive from justice and that a reward of a thousand dollars would be paid for his capture, dead or alive! He was John McKenzie, the outlaw.

She caught up her revolver, thinking rapidly. With the reward money, she could go East with her son and open a restaurant. But—John McKenzie had taken her child by the hand, and, as the proverb says, herself by the heart thereby. Cautiously she moved toward the doorway, as yet undecided. The great pistol hung heavily in her small hand. Her lower lip trembled—and then set tightly against its mate; with a resolute look on her finely-molded face, she pulled the hammer of the Colt's back to a full and went on.

"Put up your hands!" she ordered in a voice that had neither weakness nor gentleness in its tones.

The outlaw looked toward her surprisedly, let the guitar fall to his lap, and raised his hands a little higher than his head.

"They're up, ma'am," he said easily, laughing. "It ain't such a big disgrace to be arrested by a woman, you know; they're ten times as apt fo shoot as menfolks are. And, besides, it's sort o' nice to be caught by as pretty a woman as you—begging your pardon, of course, for the saying of it."

"Never mind that," replied the young widow. "Keep your hands where they are."

She went to him and took his pair of blued revolvers from their holsters, then crossed the room and threw the weapons into an open chest; a moment later, and she had closed the chest and locked it.

"Say, ma'am," begged John McKenzie, "won't you let me lower my arms? I promise good behavior."

"Lower them," agreed the woman. "But remember the reward is for dead or alive, and be careful. I can shoot. I'll be ready in a minute or two. We'll get on horses and go to Mordaunt then."

Again the big brown man smiled. He took up the guitar as complacently as though nothing had happened, and resumed his apparently pleasurable occupation of amusing the child. In a clear, strong voice he began to sing "Darling Sue," a pathetic, sentimental song that was popular at that day. And he began with the last four lines:

" 'Flowers that she loved so well,
Not the kind that townfolks sell,
Just some little wild bluebells—
I takes and lays 'em where my heart lies too!' "

It sounded queer, coming from the lips of a bad man. In the tones there was a depth of feeling that was surprising. Behind the singer Mrs. Jefferson clutched at her throat as though something therein choked her; she pressed a hand to her full round bosom to still its trembling. There was a throng of memories, memories sweeter than life and sadder than death, crowding into her heart. The dust—the dust of life! Then with a great sob she dropped her revolver and rushed to the side of the man she had disarmed but a few minutes before. Down on her knees she went, with her hands clasped before her as she clasped them when she prayed in the silent hours to the Great Friend of lone and lonely women.

"I can't take you to Mordaunt, McKenzie!" she cried brokenly. "Forgive me for trying—I needed the reward money so much, and that is why I tried——"

"I wouldn't feel like that, ma'am," said the outlaw, seriously, laying a brown hand on her sun-bright hair much as though he were priest in the act of bestowing a blessing. "Honest, ma'am, I wouldn't feel like that!"

"Forgive me!" the widow cried again. "I wanted the reward so badly, or I wouldn't have tried it. I wanted to take my boy to the East, where there are schools; I could educate him there; I couldn't do it here. My husband's father cast him out when he married me, because I was an orphan and penniless; I can depend on nobody but myself."

John McKenzie rubbed his stubby chin thoughtfully. "What brought about the sudden change?"

"That song," quickly. "My husband used to sing it to me so much. He always called me 'Darling Sue.' My name is Sue—Sue Jefferson."

"Sue Jefferson," repeated McKenzie, with growing interest in his eyes. "Not a relative of Bowers Jefferson, the Ranger?"

"His wife." She rose from her knees. "He was killed five years ago today, McKenzie. Oh, he was killed five years ago today, when our baby was only a few months old——"

"Killed!" The outlaw also had risen. He stood there staring at the woman with pain in his eyes. "Bowers Jefferson dead five years? I wonder why I never heard about it! Ma'am, I owe my life twice to your man. I liked him better than anybody else in the world. I rode a Bar-Q horse in his territory for years, and he found me in a close place with rustlers twice; each time they'd ha' fixed me if it hadn't been for him. That was before—I went bad. If I ain't bad mistaken, I learned the 'Darlin' Sue' song from your husband. * * * * The wife and baby o' Bowers Jefferson shall never suffer while I'm alive, ma'am. You get ready for a trip. You're goin' to take me to the Big Town and claim the thousand dollars, that's what you're goin' to do."

"I can't," moaned the woman. "I tell you, I can't!"

McKenzie seized her wrists and held them tightly.

"But you can, you will, you've got to!" he declared. "Think about your little boy. He's got to be educated, and you sure can't do it out here—now can you? I'll get out of jail, all right; you needn't have any fears about that part of it. You've got a sort of wagon, I saw it. We'll go in it. You can drive in the daytime, and I'll sleep in the wagon; I'll have to stand guard at night, you know. Get ready, ma'am!" He dropped her wrists.

Mrs. Jefferson looked long and thoughtfully into the deep gray eyes of the big man who had sung her husband's song. She saw determination in the depths of those eyes, and she saw a greater strength in the sunburned, boyish face. She knew then that she would never be able to disobey him.

"Why not go to Mordaunt?" she asked.

"Because there's no sheriff in Mordaunt," smilingly, "that's why. It's only five days' drive to the Big Town."

"Hitch the horses to the wagon," she finally told him. "And remember," she added—as a balm to her conscience, "it's all your own doing, McKenzie."

Not long afterward the three of them climbed into the old canvas-covered wagon and drove away straight to the northward, where the beaten trails were few.

The sun went down, and the long and lonesome twilight of the desert came. Mrs. Jefferson, John McKenzie and Bowers Jefferson the second sat around a little fire of catclaw and pinon watching the coffee boil. The woman turned to the outlaw and asked:

"Do you mind telling me what started you?"

"Not in the least, ma'am," answered the outlaw. "I killed a man—his name was Haley. I done it in defense of myself, but I knowed I could never prove it; only his friends saw the thing done. It's his brothers that offered the re-

The Pumpkin Hood

By N. R. Miller

A RAINY day had driven the house party of young people to the large roomy attic for entertainment. The girls were looking through a trunk of old-fashioned garments in search of material to aid in their costumes for the tableaux which were to be given that evening.

As Ruth Wallace drew forth a curious padded thing like nothing she had ever seen before, she uttered an exclamation. "Oh, Helen! What is this queer thing?" she asked, holding the object aloft.

"Why, that is Grandma's old pumpkin hood," was the answer, "and there is a story connected with it. Would you like to hear it?"

"Wouldn't we!" they exclaimed in chorus. "But you do not mean to tell me that they ever wore anything like that on their heads?" queried Ruth.

"But they did, just that," responded Helen, "and I expect forty or fifty years from now our fashions will look just as strange. But come down now to Grandma's room and we will get her to tell us the story."

"The girls want to hear the story of the pumpkin hood, Grandma," said Helen, when they had seated themselves around the fireplace in Grandma's large, pleasant room.

"Well, dears," said Grandma in a reminiscent tone, "it carries me back to the exciting days of the 'Underground Railroad.' "

"What," asked one of the girls, "did they have subways when you were a girl?"

"No," was the reply. "It was a different railroad from any that you ever saw or rode upon. It was in slavery times, before the war, and many slaves sought freedom by escaping to the North and thence to Canada, where they were beyond the power of their owners, if found. If they were captured in the States their owners had the right to demand them and carry them back. There were people all along the line willing to help them escape and their homes were called the stations of the underground railroad. My father's home was one of these stations.

"The day of which I am to tell you I was alone, my parents having gone away for the day. I was at that time fifteen years old, but large and strong for my age. I had just finished baking bread and was taking the last loaf from the oven when the kitchen door was suddenly thrown open and a colored girl who could not have been many years older than myself, burst into the room.

" 'Oh, Missus, save me! They are right after me!' she gasped, rather than spoke. It took me but a minute to comprehend the situation, startled as I was. I knew this girl must be a runaway slave. I began to think quickly. Where could I conceal her? There was a hidden room at the barn, cleverly contrived under a haymow, but there was not time to reach it as doubtless even now her pursuers were in sight.

"Suddenly I thought of a place which might do. Grasping hold of her arm I half dragged, half carried her up-stairs into my room. There, pushing aside the bed I removed a loose board. 'Creep in quickly,' I ordered. There was just barely room for her to crowd herself into the narrow space. 'Keep perfectly quiet and scarcely breathe if you hear any one in this room,' I said, while carefully replacing the board.

"The thought entered my mind, 'What should I say if they should ask me if I had seen the slave girl.' From the strict discipline of my New England parents, I had been taught a rigid adherence to truth and never under any circumstances, even that good might come of it, to utter a falsehood. I didn't have long to deliberate, for scarcely had I entered the kitchen before there was a loud knock at the door and harsh voices demanded entrance. With my heart in my mouth I went to the door and threw it open.

" 'Have you seen a fugitive girl pass here this morning?' demanded the leader, abruptly.

" 'No,' was my truthful reply, 'I have seen no one pass.'

" 'Then she must be concealed about this place,' was the angry retort, 'for we have traced her here. She is altogether too valuable a slave to lose and we must search the premises, with your permission or without.'

"Drawing myself up proudly, I said with a confidence I was far from feeling:

" 'You may search the place, sir, but you will find no one.'

"He immediately sent two of his men to guard the barn and outbuildings while he searched the house, I leading the way. Down cellar he even peered into the pork barrel and among the pickles and preserves.

"When the lower part of the house had been thoroughly searched, we went up-stairs. We came to my room last. When he had looked everywhere, even under the bed, he pulled out the bed and started to rap on the wall. I was sure then that all was discovered, when a sound from below drew his attention, and thinking that one of his men had found the fugitive, he hastily left the room and descended to the kitchen. Knowing that he would be sure to return and find the hiding place of his victim, I hastily removed the board, dragged out the trembling girl and pushed her into another room which had been thoroughly searched.

" 'Conceal yourself in the closet behind some of the clothing,' I whispered, as I pushed her into the room. 'He may not go back in there again. It is your only chance. Hurry as I hear him returning!'

"All this took less time than it does to tell it, and when the man returned, he found me where he had left me, waiting at the top of the stairs outwardly calm and unperturbed. He took up the search where he had left it and in rapping on the wall found the loose board.

" 'Aha, what have we here?' he said, as he hastily removed the board. He had found the concealed recess but the object of his search was not there. With much chagrin he left the room. I imagined he looked with suspicion at the door of the room opposite which in my haste I had not entirely closed, my heart almost stopped beating when he threw the door wide open, but with a careless glance at the room he went down-stairs and joined his men below. In a short time I saw them riding away. When I was sure they had really gone I returned to my charge and conducted her back to the hidden recess, which I deemed the safest place for her that day. If they should return they would not think of looking there again.

"Making her as comfortable as I could with a quilt and pillow, I descended to the kitchen to prepare her some lunch.

"When father and mother came home at night, there was a consultation held. The question was how to get the fugitive to the next station. It was finally decided that she should go disguised as my mother. The next day we dressed her in mother's cloak, hood and veil so that her identity was completely hidden. The pumpkin hood was the very same one which you have here. Mother and I had been planning to visit this place so I drove. Our route took us through the village and as we passed the hotel my heart gave a great bound, for there were the three slave hunters, standing on the veranda, holding a low conversation. As long as I was in the village I dared not drive fast for fear of suspicion. Once I heard the sound of wheels behind us and I was sure we were being followed.

As soon as the village was left behind, I made the horse fly over the ground at a fearful rate. Whoever it was who caused my fright, was soon left behind and I did not relax speed until we had reached our destination."

"Did the girl get to Canada all right?" asked Ruth.

"Yes, they kept her a few days at the next station and we heard that eventually she reached Canada."

Why Sunburn Is Healthful

By Dr. A. M. Hughes

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

"JUST as soon as I go out in the sun for a day I become as tanned as leather and I feel badly about it because it spoils my complexion," is a complaint I frequently hear from women.

The statement interests me because it tells me something about the condition of that person's blood. The woman who becomes sunburned readily should be glad of it because it means that she is not anæmic, nor likely to become so, under normal conditions. No person who is really anæmic, whose blood is thin and poor, will become very badly sunburned. They may blister in the hot sun, but the real sunburn that leaves a dark brown tint to the skin is not for them. This is because one cannot become tanned, which is really what is generally meant when the word "sunburn" is used, unless her blood is in fairly good condition.

Nature always does things perfectly if given a chance. In the case of sunburn Nature would give every person a good coat of tan, if possible, because this tan protects the skin. The white skin is more deeply penetrated by the sun's rays than the dark skin, hence blondes, and people with very light skins, sunburn much more readily than people of olive complexions, or whose skin is very dark. Nature doesn't intend that we should become blistered by the sun, and we will not if we are healthy and do not deliberately expose ourself for hours to the burning sun. Nature's first duty is to turn the skin darker to protect against the rays of the sun and prevent blistering. To do this it is necessary to have good blood, hence sunburn is an indication of fairly good blood.

When the sun shines upon the skin the hæmoglobin in the blood—that part that supplies the color—at once deposits in the skin at the very tip ends of the fine arteries which penetrate to within a thousandth of an inch of the outer skin, a pigment. This pigment is deposited in quantities according to the amount of exposure there is to the sun and very soon the pigments begin to show. The fair skin-color disappears, the pigments turn it first red and then, remaining, turn the skin brown and this remains throughout the season so long as one is exposed to the sun. In fact I have noted that sunburned shoulders frequently show darker away along in December, months after they have been covered constantly by clothes, than the skin that was not exposed in summer.

If your blood is not good there is little hæmoglobin in it, and without the hæmoglobin there can be no sunburn. Consequently your sunburned person is a vigorous person.

Still another reason why sunburn is healthy is that the active light rays of the sun give a healthy stimulus to the respiratory process, since under their influence it has been proven that the quantity of oxygen absorbed is greater, while an increasing output of carbonic acid follows. Exposure to sunlight also increases the number of blood cells, this gives us a wider circulation of the blood which, in turn, builds new tissues quicker and stronger, and the new tissues mean a healthier body.

Experiments have been made in England and described in the Lancet, than which there is no higher medical authority among publications, and these are all to the effect that good sunburn almost invariably means good health. Frequently physicians have verified this by experiment. Blood tests have been made of people who sunburn readily and of others who blister but seldom if ever really become tanned, and the blood of the former has without exception been found much better than the blood of the latter.

By all means become sunburned this summer. If you cannot get sunburned, although you make the effort, then consult some physician, tell him about it and begin treatment that will improve the quality of your blood.

But please use common sense about getting sunburned. Do not try to do it all in a day. Do not blister the skin by too much exposure to the sun at once, as these burns are frequently deep always painful and very often lead to serious troubles, such as blood poisoning from infections when the blisters break, and the like.

The wind and the sun together will sunburn. Use a sunshade if your eyes are weak, or orange glasses, because the sun, while tanning you, may give you bad eye strain. Such exposure of the eyes frequently strains the optic nerve which has direct connection with the stomach, and bilious attacks follow.

Once you are well sunburned you may expose the skin to the sun all day without ill effects. Before becoming thus tanned one of the dangers of blistering is to go in bathing and then, after coming out of the water, expose yourself to the hot rays of the sun before the water has dried off from your face, neck, arms and shoulders. The sun, shining through the water on your skin, will blister within a few minutes sometimes, much as the sun's rays through a reading glass will scorch and then ignite paper and other inflammable objects.

Do not apply creams and go out. They will melt, fill the pores of the skin and these greasy pores will collect dust and dirt to such an extent that even a scrubbing can scarcely remove it. This means "blackheads" and such disfigurements.

Go ahead and get sunburned. It won't hurt you. You will look all the better for it, you will feel much better for it and it will proclaim to all that you are strong, physically, that your blood is good and that you have vigor that is worth while.

There are now many places where sun-baths form a large part of the treatment for all sorts of ailments, especially tuberculosis. There are "solariums" where defective children are helped by the sun's rays. The more you are sunburned, the more free you will be of germs because the sun is the greatest germicide there is.

By Solving the Food Problem

American Women Will Do Their Share In Fighting the War to a Successful Finish

By Violet Marsh

SETTING an example to the country in reducing their scale of living to the simplest possible form, Mrs. Wilson, wife of the President; Mrs. Marshall, wife of the Vice-President, and wives of cabinet members, have issued an appeal to all the women in America, to do all in their power in similar manner, both as individuals and organizations to conserve, and use the strictest economy in food stuffs, and thus prevent actual distress later on.

In addition to this, the women leaders in official life have decided to omit the usual formal entertaining and calling which have been the most important features in the social life of Washington, in order to be able to devote more time and money to constructive preparedness and relief work.

Miss Margaret Wilson, daughter of President Wilson, subscribed $1,000 to the Red Cross fund, money earned by herself in singing in concerts, and is still giving concerts for this same purpose. Both Mrs. Wilson and Miss Margaret Wilson are personally attending to the management of the White House that the strictest economy may prevail.

Secretary Lane says: "The women of the country can do no greater work at this time than to raise their own vegetables, can their own fruit, prevent waste in their homes and give impulse and enthusiasm to the men of the land. If they do this they will be doing a good fifty per cent of the work of fighting the war to a finish. Secretary Lane would organize all the women in the United States into a "Lend a Hand Wilson League," whose business it would be to let the farmer know that his patriotism would be judged by the use he makes of his land, and himself see that the boys and girls serve in a great maintenance corps of the nation by putting in their time feeding the chickens, canning surplus fruit and vegetables, and thus count themselves among the saviors of liberty and civilization, because the war has now come down to a matter of work and sacrifice.

City parks and unoccupied lots of land all over the country will this summer be planted, and to a large extent cared for by the boys and girls.

In some communities, each Boy Scout has pledged himself to raise vegetables sufficient to feed one soldier. In one city alone, 6,000 boys above the age of sixteen will be released from the high school on April 17th, provided they take a pledge to work on farms, or enter some employment by which the food supply of the nation may be increased.

During the war, or so long as the war has to do with our supply of food, COMFORT housewives will be assisted in carrying out methods of food economy, whereby available materials may be used to the best possible advantage. Three well-balanced meals each day does not necessarily include meat, where nitrogenous materials such as eggs, milk, cheese, and beans or peas are used. Where fish can be obtained fresh and cheap, it should frequently be made the main dish of the meal. "Let not a scrap of food be wasted" should be the slogan of the American housewife, for no one can tell how long the war will last, or how long it will affect the supply of food for this nation.

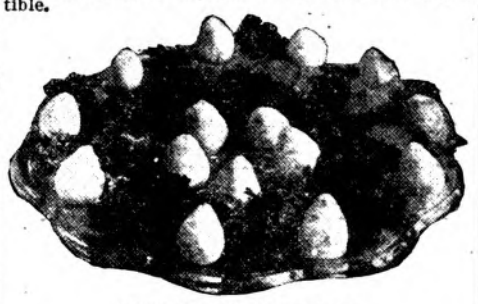
Economizing on the Meat Supply

There are three ways by which this may be accomplished: First, by cutting down the number of meat days. Second, by selecting cuts of meat according to food value. Third, by cooking so that no waste shall take place. The highest priced cuts of beef are the loin and ribs, containing from twenty to twenty-five per cent of fat, which, if not eaten at the table or otherwise utilized, makes a very costly meat dish. Pork chops contain thirty-two per cent of fat, and even when economically handled are necessarily expensive. And thus it would follow that the cheaper cuts of meat must be resorted to in war time, and let it not be beneath the dignity of every woman to take this step of economy, and to further prevent waste by proper cooking and serving.

BERRY WHIP.

How to Use Every Part of a Cut

Unless meat is to be boiled, remove all fat and bone. Try out the fat for frying and shortening purposes. Bones are used in stews and soups; cooked with split peas and bean soups, thus making a substitute for meat dishes. Ribs are removed with a small amount of meat left on, and cooked into braised ribs of beef so commonly served in first-class eating places. When meat is slowly simmered long enough to extract the fat, marrow and gelatine from the bones, there is no waste. Here the meat should be removed, the liquor left standing over night so that the fat can be removed in a cake and then the liquor used as a meat substitute by adding rice, vegetables or macaroni. When the meat is all lean, and cooked by boiling, first sear it, then add a little water, cover closely and bake slowly. This is called smothered meat.



APPLE FLUFF.

The most important principle of boiling meat is, that it be kept at the simmering point, instead of boiling, for if it does boil, there is a loss of weight, due to evaporation; also a loss of flavor and the meat will be stringy. For this reason, many prefer the oven heat which can be kept low and even.

Trying Out And Clarifying Fat

A double boiler is the best utensil for trying out fat, in order to avoid over-heating which injures the flavor and makes the fat less digestible.

HOME-MADE CHEESE BALLS.

Fats are clarified best with a sliced raw potato. Put into fat and let stand on back of stove until potato is browned. To promote economy, set away the fat until raw potato peels are at hand, then use them in place of a good potato. Avoid burning the roast drippings that they may be clarified and profitably used. Sausage fat, and fat skimmed from vegetables add a good flavor to fried potatoes. Always fry cooked potatoes quickly and remove from fat, else they will be greasy. Wash, scrape if necessary, and wipe all meats before cooking, that the trimmings may be used for soups and stews. The excess of fat from fowl should be removed before cooking, tried out, and used for pastry, cookies and gingerbread.

Seven Inexpensive Meals of One Principal Dish to be Served with Bread and Butter and Dessert

No. 1.

MEAT STEW WITH DUMPLINGS.—Select two pounds of a cheaper cut of beef; remove the fat,

RICE AND CORN MUFFINS.

using enough to try out and brown the meat in, which has been cut into small pieces. When well browned, cover with boiling water, bring to boiling point and simmer two hours, then add half a cup each of turnip and carrot cut into half-inch cubes, and one small onion sliced. Bring to boiling point again and cook one half hour; add three cups of potato cut fine and cook another half hour. During the cooking, add a sufficient quantity of boiling water to keep vegetables covered. Thicken with two tablespoons of flour stirred up with cold water. Season with salt and pepper.

DUMPLINGS.—Two cups of sifted flour mixed with four teaspoons of baking powder and one half teaspoon of salt. Work in two teaspoons of hard beef fat. Stir in two thirds cup of milk, or a little more if flour swells considerably. The best way to cook dumplings is drop them from a spoon onto a buttered steamer set over a kettle of boiling water; or they may be laid onto the vegetables. Steam twelve minutes without lifting the cover. Serve with stew.

STEAMED PRUNES.—Soak in cold water until they will rinse clean. Put into a steamer over a kettle of boiling water and cook until well puffed. Remove from steamer and roll in sugar. Put into a glass dish, cover with whipped cream, and serve with thin slices of buttered bread.—See illustrated heading.

No. 2.

ROAST PORK WITH COWPEAS.—Select a leg of young pork which is nourishing and not high priced. Wash and scrape well. Make a deep cut in the knuckle, and put in a little sage, salt and pepper. Roast very slowly one hour, then with a sharp knife, make slashes just through the outer rind around and lengthwise that the fat may try out. Cook half an hour longer and drain off the fat. Have parboiled and partly cooked, one quart of cowpeas, and add to the pork. Finish cooking slowly until meat is brown and peas tender. Sprinkle with salt fifteen minutes before done.

CORN-MEAL BREAD.—Two cups of corn-meal, half a cup of wheat flour, two teaspoons of cream of tartar, one teaspoon of soda, half a teaspoon of salt, and two tablespoons of sugar mixed together. Add six tablespoons of sweet or sour cream, and sweet milk enough to make a soft batter—about one and a quarter cups. Bake in shallow pans about half an inch thick, in a fairly hot oven until a rich brown. If cream is not obtainable, use two tablespoons of softened butter.

APPLE FLUFF.—Cut three large tart apples into quarters, but do not peel or core; put into an earthern baking dish with quarter of a cup of water and bake in a hot oven until soft. Rub quickly through a wire sieve. Beat the whites of three eggs stiff, add one cup of powdered sugar and beat again; add sifted apple and beat until very fluffy. Fill tall glasses, and garnish with a little whipped cream and a cube of jelly.

No. 3.

RAGOUT OF MUTTON WITH PEAS AND CEREAL CAKES.—Select two pounds of the neck and cut into small pieces. In a stew pan on the back of stove, put one tablespoon of flour and when it bubbles add one tablespoon of flour and lightly brown. Add one medium-sized onion and one carrot cut in small pieces and stir until very hot. Remove vegetables and put the mutton into sauce pan, stirring until meat is well seared. Return vegetables and cover meat and vegetables with three cups of boiling water; add one teaspoon of salt, one saltspoon of white pepper, one whole clove, one half bay leaf and two sprigs of parsley. Cover tightly and slowly simmer two hours. Drain one can of peas and add five minutes before serving.

CEREAL CAKES.—To each cup of cold boiled rice or left-over breakfast cereal, add two tablespoons of flour, one beaten egg, a little grated lemon rind, salt, cayenne pepper and a pinch of nutmeg. Make thin cakes, and fry brown in salt pork fat. Serve with butter.

BERRY WHIP.—Crush one pint of berries; add sugar and lemon juice to flavor. Beat whites of two eggs until stiff and add a pinch of salt; continue beating, gradually adding the crushed berry mixture. Put into a shallow glass dish, cover one white of egg beaten stiff and sweetened, and whole berries. Serve at once.

No. 4.

MEAT, POTATO AND TOMATO PIE.—This dish offers an excellent way of using left-over meats; mutton and beef, with the addition of a little ham for flavor. Use a deep earthern baking dish, and in the bottom put a layer of sliced fresh tomato, or drained canned tomato, then a layer of thinly sliced meat. Dredge with flour, pepper and salt, and cover with a layer of thinly sliced raw potato. Repeat until dish is three quarters full, and then cover with a layer of pastry. Put into a hot oven, reducing the heat after the first ten minutes, and bake one hour.

FRIED BREAD.—Cut a loaf of stale bread into inch thick slices and remove crust. Beat together one egg, two tablespoons of sugar, and one and one quarter cups of milk, and stir over the fire until it thickens slightly, but does not boil. Dip slices of bread into this until well soaked, and fry a golden brown in hot fat. Sprinkle with a pinch of cinnamon mixed with a tablespoon of sugar and serve while hot with cheese balls.

CHEESE BALLS.—Wet a cheese-cloth in salted water, and put it over a wire sieve. Pour thick sour milk into this, cover and drain until firm. Salt, and shape into balls. Many prefer putting the milk into a bag and hanging it in the sun until firm.

No. 5.

STUFFED HEART.—Beef heart can be bought at a low price and makes a very palatable dish if properly cooked. Wash the heart inside and out and wipe dry. Dip one cup of diced bread in beef fat and brown; add one small chopped onion and season with salt and pepper. Fill the heart with bread mixture and sew up the opening. Put the heart into a dish that is deep but not too large over, and just cover with boiling water. After it begins to boil, set in the oven and cook slowly two hours tightly covered. Remove, dredge with flour, pepper and salt, a little brown sugar and pinch of clove, and bake brown. In the same baking pan, put boiled potatoes cut in quarters and dipped in beef drippings, and brown. Serve heart surrounded with potato on same platter.

TAPIOCA JELLY.—Wash one third of a cup of pearl tapioca and drain. Put into a double boiler and add two and one half cups of cold water; cook until tapioca is dissolved. Add a pinch of salt, two tablespoons of lemon juice and three heaping tablespoons of sugar. Turn into a mould and set over night to harden. Turn out on a plate and garnish with fresh berries.

No. 6.

SALT PORK WITH MILK GRAVY AND POTATO.—Cut salt pork into thin slices, and if very salt, cover with hot water and let stand five minutes. Fry slowly until a golden brown, first cutting through the rind so the slices will not curl. Remove the fried pork to a hot dish, and drain off part of the fat to be used for other purposes. The gravy is made by slowly adding dry flour to the hot fat, two tablespoons of flour and two of fat to each cup of scalded milk, which is added after flour and fat has cooked together three minutes, then cook all together very slowly five minutes longer. Have ready potatoes prepared as follows: Peel and stand in cold salted water half an hour. Barely cover with boiling water, or put into a steamer and cook until tender. Drain and shake kettle on hot cover until potatoes are dry. Cut in quarters, put on a deep serving platter, pour over the gravy and make a border of the fried slices of pork.

APPLE DUMPLING.—Pare and core tart apples. Make fairly rich pastry and roll thin. Cut in squares large enough to cover apple. Wet square of crust, place apple in center, filling cavity with sugar, a pinch of cinnamon and small piece of butter. Fold over the crust, pinching edges so the juice will not run out. Put into a hot oven for ten minutes, then reduce heat and bake forty minutes.

SAUCE.—Mix two teaspoons of corn-starch with one cup of sugar and add to two cups of boiling water. Simmer twenty-five minutes and add the grated rind and juice of one lemon and two even tablespoons of butter. Serve hot with dumplings.

No. 7.

MEAT, POTATO AND EGGS COMBINED.—A savory and nourishing dinner can be made from left-overs with or without the addition of the eggs. Combine left-over scraps of meat, or corn beef by itself. Sausage meat combines well with all other kinds, also bacon or ham. Chop cold boiled potatoes and add left-over onions or carrots if on hand. Flavor according to the taste of the family. Moisten with a little milk, cream or fat. Add one part chopped meat to three of vegetable. Put into a baking dish, cover close and bake in a hot oven twenty minutes. Have ready slices of oven toast made from brown or white bread. On each slice put a portion of the hash, and on top of this a poached egg.

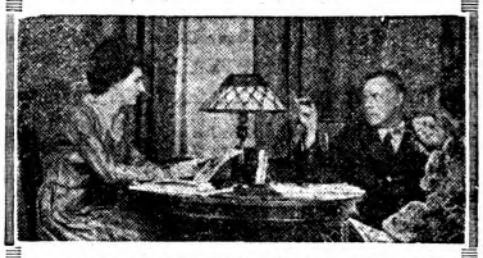
RICE AND CORN MUFFINS.—Mix into one cup of corn-meal one teaspoon of salt, one teaspoon of sugar, two teaspoons of baking powder. Work in one cup of cold boiled rice until fine. Add one egg well beaten, one quarter of a cup of milk and two tablespoons of melted butter. Beat thoroughly, pour into hot greased gem pans and bake thirty minutes.

STRAWBERRY SHORTCAKE.—Two cups of flour, half a teaspoon of salt, one teaspoon of cream of tartar and half a teaspoon of soda mixed together. Rub in one quarter of a cup of butter. Beat one egg, and add to it one scant cup of milk, then stir into the dry materials. Bake in round shallow tins until golden brown. Mash berries and sweeten while cake is baking. Split cake and butter, and fill with berries and pour berries over the top. Or, if more crust is desired, bake in two thin cakes, putting berries between buttered crusts, and pour over top.

Begin Canning Now and Put Up an Ample Store of Canned Fruit and Vegetables

COMFORT'S oft repeated advice to can a liberal supply of all kinds of fruits, berries and vegetables applies now with greater force than ever before. Canned goods are scarce and high priced, and it is predicted that fall prices will range higher because of advance in wages and the scarcity and high price of tin. In the cities the housewives have taken alarm and are buying heavily and hoarding canned goods.

It behooves every family, and especially those on the farms, to begin early and can as large a quantity as possible of each kind of native fruit, berries and fresh vegetables as they come in season for the purpose not only of reducing the cost of living by providing a liberal supply for the home table but in order also to have a surplus to sell. If neatly and carefully put up home-canned goods will find a ready market at good prices.



Besides canning put up preserves, jams, jellies, marmalades, pickles and ketchup.

If your supply of glass preserving jars and rubbers is not ample start at once to replenish it for the stocks in the stores are small and most likely will run short this season as there will be an unusually large demand for them. Save every bottle, jar and crock that can be used for preserves, jams, jellies or ketchup.

We hope our readers have kept the instructive series of articles on home canning with recipes which COMFORT printed during the spring and summer of last year.

Valuable bulletins on home canning and preserving can be had free by writing to the U. S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

CHAPTER IX.

THE DAPPERLINGS' MOONLIGHT PARTY.

"Dear Dapperling Friends;
We send you this note
By Pertwee, inviting you all
To come to the banquet we give every year
In our spacious assembly hall.

"Perhaps, if the weather is perfectly fine,
And the moonlight sufficiently bright,
Our tables we'll spread out of doors, on the lawn,
Come early next Saturday night."

THIS was the invitation the Dapperlings sent to their friends who lived miles away, the ones who had snared Chippie Chatter. Quillikin had spent hours in writing it, and felt so proud of it that the others didn't praise it as they would otherwise have done. He read it over to them all together, and then to each one alone.

"It's a great thing to be a poet," he said; "that second line of the second verse, now—'The moonlight sufficiently bright,' that's what you might call real poetry, that is!"

All the Dapperlings signed it, and Pertwee mounted his rabbit and started off happily on his long ride to deliver it.

Then the Dapperlings set to work to prepare for the party. They planned to make this one a little finer than any they had ever given.

Don't ask me what they had to eat. I couldn't remember the names of half their dishes, most of them things that only Dapperlings know how to cook, but of course they had raspberries and blueberries and such things that grew around near their hill.

It took a great deal of work to get things ready. The assembly hall and every house had to be cleaned and trimmed with flowers. Then there was all the cooking to do and berries to pick. Everybody had to help.

Pertwee was lucky to be the one to deliver the invitation. He knew this, and stayed all night with his friends instead of coming straight back, as he should have done.

Quillikin was usually one of the best helpers, but just now he was so filled with thoughts of the poem he meant to surprise them with after the banquet, that he wasn't much good at working. Why, Nattie found him leaning against the thistles, gazing up at the sky, and he didn't even know the thistles had been pricking him till she pulled three of the sharp spikes out of his left ear, where they had stuck fast.

As for Nattie, she ran here and there at everyone's call, until she was so tired she could hardly climb into her little bed at night.

When Saturday night came, the Dapperlings were ready early, all dressed in their best, waiting for their friends. Nattie was gay in a ruffly little gown that looked as if it might have been cut from a pink sunset cloud.

Quillikin, in a fine new suit of crimson and violet, looked very grand.

"There's going to be a big surprise tonight," he told the others, but when they questioned him, he would only shake his head and answer, "Wait and see! I don't tell all I know."

"Hawk!" said old Shandle-Spinx, who had been listening, with his ear pressed to the ground. "I can hear them. They will be here in exactly two minutes."

Then they all heard a quick pattering of little paws, and soon a crowd of rabbits, with their riders, appeared at the top of the hill.

It was the loveliest kind of a night, with the moonlight bright and beautiful.

Of course the guests had to be taken through all the houses and into the assembly hall, else what would have been the use of all the work that had been done, decorating so finely?

In the assembly hall they talked politely for a while, and everybody shook hands with everybody else, but the real fun of the evening was out of doors, where they played games, and had a merry time.

After the lively games, they began to think of supper. Long tables were brought out, covered with silvery cloths, fine and thin as spiders' webs, and all the tempting things for the banquet spread out. The Dapperlings were glad enough to gather about and begin the feast.

EXPLANATORY.—This story tells the strange things that happen to five-year-old Simmie-Sammie Smith and his sister Pittysing, nearly two years older, through the sly pranks of Nattie, the "Smallest Dapperling of All." The Dapperlings are kind-hearted, gay little elflike beings who ride on rabbits and never let themselves be seen by human eyes because of their belief that, if seen, it would bring some terrible calamity upon them. For this reason their queer little houses are always built into the hillside, and are so made, with doors and windows in front and grass growing on the backs, that they can be turned around to face out when the Dapperlings are by themselves; but as soon as anybody comes in sight the houses are whirled around so that only the grass-covered backs are seen and, as these look like the rest of the hill, you would never know the houses were there. They also have an underground assembly hall with an opening in the top covered with moss and concealed in a clump of thistles.

Quillikin ate little. His mind was filled with his poem, and often his hand slipped into his pocket, to touch lovingly the paper it was written on.

Feasting so happily, with laughter and merriment, little did those Dapperlings think what was coming! And so suddenly it came, there was not a moment's time to prepare for it.

To be sure, old Shandle-Spinx, who had the sharpest of ears, had heard, off in the distance, sounds something like this:

"Wow! gr-r-r! wow!"

"S-s-s-phitt! phitt! phitt!"

"Yip! yip! gr-r-r! wow!"

But he had thought little of it. Afterwards, he blamed himself for not noticing it more.

Well, the first thing the others knew, there was a sudden rush from out the moonlit space—a long, yellow streak dashed among them, overturning tables, breaking dishes, upsetting Dapperlings—old Cattie Puss, her ears laid back, her tail a dozen times its usual size! Frightened—I should say so—both Cattie Puss and the Dapperlings!

And after the yellow streak, hard at its heels, chasing for dear life, was, what do you think? A shaggy, long-eared puppy dog, his red tongue hanging from his mouth, his short legs frantically trying to reach poor, flying Cattie Puss.

I haven't told you before, but the children's father had bought the puppy dog for them to play with. Pittysing and Simmie-Sammie loved him, but Cattie Puss didn't!

Cattie Puss didn't stop to see what damage she had done. Perhaps she never noticed the Dapperlings and their banquet at all. She ran straight on—I'm sure I don't know how far!

But the puppy dog stopped. He had found something that interested him more. How his red tongue lapped up those good things the poor little Dapperlings had cooked!

The Dapperlings picked themselves up, and ran to get out of the way of that dreadful black and white monster, leaving what was left of their overturned feast. Oh, such an ending to the party!

"But never mind," they said. "We'll have another party soon, and have it in the assembly hall, where we'll be per-fectly safe!"

You see, they were sensible little people, and knew it was just as easy to be happy as unhappy, and much, much pleasanter.

Their visitors couldn't go home that night, for when Cattie Puss and the puppy dog came, their rabbits had run off home, every single one.

Old Shandle-Spinx took Quillikin off by himself, and said to him sternly, "Now, sir, tell me about this matter! Did you, or did you not know that cat and dog were coming to spoil the party? You said there'd be a big surprise!"

"I did NOT know it!" answered Quillikin in his loftiest manner. "I had written the finest poem in the world to read tonight after the banquet. But now, since you are so unjust and unkind to me, I shall burn the poem, and no one will ever see it! Yes, I will burn it, though you should go down on your knees and beg me not to!"

Next morning the puppy dog was playing with something under the kitchen table. Pittysing made a dash for him.

"What you got now?" she demanded, dropping down on her knees beside him. For the puppy dog had a bad habit of chewing up small articles he found lying around, such as picture books, building blocks, and other toys. And though Pittysing loved him, she didn't like to have her treasures chewed up.

She snatched up the thing the puppy was playing with, just as Simmie-Sammie came into the kitchen.

"Well, WHAT do you know about that?" she asked, holding it out for Simmie-Sammie to see. "Where did it come from? It doesn't belong to Sarah-Grace-Josephine!"

It was soiled, and the puppy dog had nearly spoiled it by chewing, but the Smallest Dapperling of All would have known it for the little pink slipper she had lost off one foot the night before, when she ran to get out of the way of that dreadful black and white monster.

The Dapperling story next month will tell about the Yellow Sleeping Beauty and magic music of the toy piano. Don't miss it in July COMFORT.

Nerine's Second Choice

I was to take the young ladies to the farm in the fly, because you would rather like, she thought, to drive up in the cart."

Nerine nodded. Solitude even after a short journey in the company of energetic persons like Joan and May would be pleasanter than having her legs kicked in the close quarters of the village fly, and she rejoiced still more at Lady Belton's forethought when she found herself, ten minutes later, driving through the sweet spring air behind the fat horse of Joan's acquaintance.

It was a hilly village, and not very remarkable, but as they mounted the first high ground they looked down on the wide, wide sea, all flushed into pink and pearl by the setting sun.

The girl gasped with pleasure. Here was another thing she had never seen; she would have liked to stop the cart and gaze and gaze her fill.

"Can you see the sea from the farmhouse?" she asked the boy who was driving.

"Oh, yes, miss! It's only a few fields off," he said stolidly, and the girl sat bolt upright, with wide eyes and nostrils eager for the sweet salt air.

The pink was gone from the sky when they reached the farmhouse, but the glow of a wide fireplace filled all the comfortable sitting-room into which a stout damsel showed Nerine. There were daffodils in a bowl on the table, and a window seat under a low long window, which promises to look in broad daylight over a garden and fields to the sea.

"Hurrah!" exclaimed Miss Lispenard. "I'm glad I didn't go home to Mr. Mayne. But I wish Agatha were here! What walks we could take!" Banishing the uncomfortable thought that Agatha could take walks with another companion now—a companion evidently more appreciated than her faithful twin.

She turned from her inspection as the children arrived, and the comely dame of the house came out to welcome them. They had stayed at the farm twice before, and were welcome visitors. Now they greeted each other and every inmate with effusion and then demanded tea at once.

"Eggs and honey, Mrs. Palmer," May said, autocratically. "This is Miss Lispenard. Mother says you are to make her comfortable."

Nerine laughed as she was led by Joan into the best bedroom, where a fire burned, and two candles gave a dim light. It was all so quaint and clean, with a smell of lavender.

They had tea in the sitting-room, May doing the honors of the honey and clotted cream, while Nerine made the tea and Joan talked unceasingly.

But at eight o'clock the nurse carried the children off to bed, and the room was strangely quiet without their cheerful voices. From over the sloping fields came the heavy sound of the ground swell, an eerie sound to unaccustomed ears. Nerine surveyed her comfortable surroundings, pulled her chair closer to the fire, and put the lamp on a table beside it. The evenings were evidently going to be very dull. By and by, when she knew the farm people better, she could go and talk to them, but tonight she would be only an unwelcome stranger if she made her way to Mrs. Palmer's abiding place. She must read till she was sleepy, and then go to bed.

There were no books about her sitting-room—that could be seen at a glance—and she had finished her novel in the train. She must go upstairs and unpack the store Lady Belton had given her.

"I do believe I am lonely," she thought as she energetically pulled at the straps of her trunk. "It is horrid without Agatha." Lifting out, without looking at them, a pile of books, she returned with some haste to the sitting-room, where she deposited them on the table with an ungrateful bump.

"If I've read you all, how cross I shall be!" and she began to turn them over. Among them was the diary she had taken from her stepfather's room. She had been afraid to leave it at Lispenard House, lest Mr. Mayne might be tempted to rummage among her possessions, as she had done among his.

Nerine took up the diary and made a long, careful attempt to open it, but it was not to be done. She could not even rip it up the back with a knife, for it had strong silver clamps which defied anything but a hammer and chisel.

"Oh, if I could only get it open!" she said, pettishly—"tonight of all nights, when I want something to think about."

There were tears in her eyes as she looked at her dead mother's book. She was so alone, so desolate without Agatha, who had deserted her so easily for new friends. And she knew so little about that young mother who had died just when her children needed her. If only she could read that book!

Bravely enough the girl wiped away her useless tears. She slipped the book into the pocket of her blue serge skirt; she might be able to find something tomorrow which would force the clasps. And in the meantime she would forget it and Agatha, and with a hot blush of shame—forget Satterlee.

She turned up the lamp and opened a novel at random from the pile; she read at first with determination and no interest, but by degrees she forgot everything but the book in her hand. It was a romance of adventure, and it led her with a magic power out and away into a strange world; it was not until her lamp began to burn dim that she lighted her candle and went sleepily up the creaking stairs. After all, the first evening had not been so bad.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

"Are you going to have lessons every day? Mother said you were."

Joan's voice sounded anxious as she looked up with a sigh from her finished breakfast, fixing her big eyes on Nerine.

Miss Lispenard came back with a start from an unprofitable journey into the past.

"Every day," she said mischievously.

Dead silence. Four wistful eyes looked from her face out of the low window across the fields green with baby grass, and out to the morning sea.

"Every day—after today, that is." She laughed sweetly at the downcast faces. "Today we are going to have a holiday, and do nothing but play. All of us."

"There, May! Who was right?" Joan cried joyfully. "I told you she had more sense than Miss Bruce." And with a united rush of white pinafores and black legs the two flew out of the room to get their things on. The spring air was refreshing to Nerine as she went down through the fields with the children; she took a hand of each, and they began to run down the long slope to the sea. How still and blue it lay, with such little ripples; only where it broke on the beach in a long, sleepy surge was there a wave at all. And what bracing air came off it! How sweet, how keen! Like a child herself, Nerine raced along the sands with her laughing, shrieking companions; danced on the very edge of the incoming wave till she had to run backward or let the clear, quick water come over her ankles; sat in the hot sun in the warm dry sand higher up, and built houses—with a watchful eye on Tommy, whose wicked little head stuck out of Joan's pocket.

It was lunch time before they knew it, and nurse had to call and wave frantically from the top of the field before any of them saw her.

In the afternoon they walked miles along the hard sand, point after point opening out before them, and by the time they got home to tea the elder girl was most beautifully and serenely fatigued.

There was no need to read late that night; even the most charming novel could not keep Nerine's eyes open after nine o'clock. She was so sleepy that she forgot all about her mother's diary, and so it came to slip her mind for days.

There was a letter from Lady Belton every morning after that, with accounts of the invalids; that was the only event.

The children did a virtuous two hours of sums and spelling every morning, and scoured the country with their adored cousin for the rest of the day. The fresh air and exercise had brought sweet roses into Nerine's cheeks, and by the end of the first week, as she walked briskly along the sands one afternoon, she felt like a new person. She could read Agatha's letters without a pang, even calmly accept those messages of brotherly regard from Lord Satterlee which decked every one of them.

They were going in a new direction this particular afternoon, and the children skipped along joyfully. As they rounded a rocky point they came out on a beautiful curved stretch of smooth hard sand; far over, moving quickly, was a black object, and the three stood gazing.

"It's some one riding," Nerine said. "What fun it must be to gallop on sand."

May's eye kindled. Why had she not brought one of the donkeys?

"It's a man, and he's coming over here," she said, dancing with excitement. "Oh, isn't it pretty to watch!"

"Climb up on this rock, out of the way," Miss Lispenard remarked with prudence, not being anxious to return either of her charges in bad repair. "Hurry."

The horse was coming like a whirlwind, the sun glancing on his bright chestnut coat.

Joan gave a wild shriek.

I DIDN'T RAISE MY BOY TO BE A COWARD

By Lydia M. Dunham O'Neil

Copyright, 1917, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

War's shadows o'er our land may fall,
And enemies assail us;
Our flag shall float above it all,
Our sons shall never fail us!
We seek no war on land or sea,
But cherish still our liberty!
We have no hateful battle-cry,
But for our homes we'll fight and die!

I didn't raise my boy to be a coward!
I brought him up in truth and bravery!
When duty calls, his voice shall answer clearly,
His mind and soul shall know no slavery!
America shall still be free,
To tyrants never bend the knee;
His country's proud defender he,
A true and valiant soldier!

What though no drop of blood were shed,
No bond of love were sundered,
If truth and liberty were dead,
Where once their voices thundered!
My boy is mine! But I and he,
Freeborn, must still unfettered be!
Our gallant sons, with shining swords,
Defend our shores from foreign hordes!

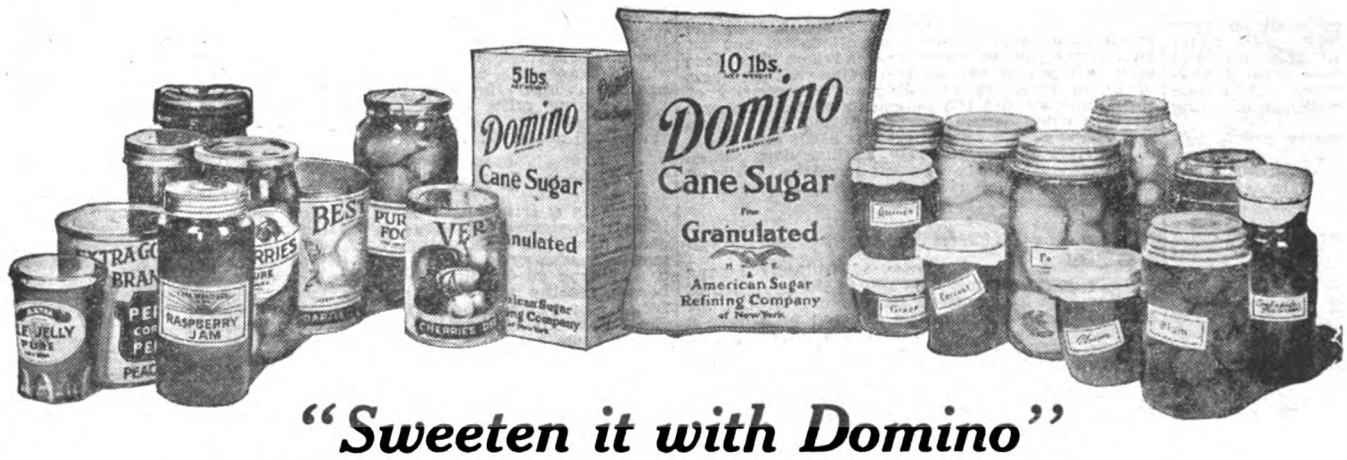
I didn't raise my boy to be a coward,
To dread the bugle-call or martial drumming.
When duty calls, his voice shall answer clearly,
"I hear thee, O my country! I am coming!"
America shall still be free,
To tyrants never bend the knee;
His country's proud defender he,
A true and valiant soldier!

The above is a patriotic reply to the caitiff wail entitled "I Did Not Raise My Boy To Be A Soldier." If this land is to hold its heritage of freedom every boy must be raised to be a soldier when called to the defense of the country.—Editor.

SAVE THE FRUIT CROP

We said this LAST YEAR—
We say it again

This is a year for thrift and service. We must feed not only our own people, but also millions in Europe. The frightful waste of fruit is a national reproach. Help stop this unpardonable extravagance. The fruit we waste would feed Belgium.



THE United States Government urges preserving as a home duty. Preserved fruits are energizing and nourishing. They vary your menus. They reduce the cost of your table.

America's canning and preserving industries are models for the world. Their products are pure, appetizing and wholesome. Support them.

If you preserve at home, put up more fruit than ever before. Get jars and glasses, bottles and crocks ready to save the fruit crop. Put away dried vegetables. The American housewife who practices thrift places herself in the ranks of those who serve their country.

You can show your thrift in no more convincing way than by combating the national tendency to squander this country's wonderful fruit crop. Whether you buy preserved fruits from your grocer or preserve at home you perform a service to your own family and to the Nation.

Vegetables That May Be Planted in June

MOST people prefer to plant their gardens as early in the spring as the ground can be worked and the danger from frost is past. This is usually a good rule, but this year prices are high and the demand for food is so great that it is well to know about crops that can be planted late and satisfactory results be obtained.

PLANT STAPLE CROPS.—More emphasis than ever before should be placed on staple crops, or those that can be stored, dried or canned or otherwise preserved for winter and spring use.

Both wax and navy beans may be planted in June in the Northern states. Wax beans may be pickled or canned or even dried, and navy beans are always a staple food, though late beans run some risk of being hit by early frosts. Cabbage, cauliflower, kohl-rabi and cucumbers can all be planted in June. Good crops of peas may be harvested if planted during this month.

Corn for both drying and canning, as well as for use as green corn, is a safe crop if planted in June.

Beets, carrots, turnips, rutabagas and parsnips all do well if planted in June, and all can be easily stored in a pit or a cool cellar.

June planted potatoes often make a good crop though this year the seed is very hard to get and the price is exceedingly high.

Pumpkins, too, will mature if planted in June and may be preserved in several ways. Dried pumpkin makes excellent pies.

Root Crops for Cows

There is certain to be need of a good supply of root crops this winter since the wheat crop is short and much of the corn and barley will need to be used for human food on account of the war. Bran will be high priced and hard to get and other grains will stay up if wheat is high. Root crops can be planted late and make excellent substitutes for grain feeds, especially corn silage. Sugar beets and carrots are best, carrots for horses, sugar beets for cows.

Beets may be planted as late as June in the Northern states and make a perfect crop. Carrots do well if planted in June and are greatly relished by both horses and cows.

WILL THEY TAINT THE MILK?—No, if fed after milking neither of these crops will affect the flavor of the milk. It has often been observed that roots, pumpkins and cabbage fed to cows out in the open yard seldom taint the milk, but if fed in the barn where the air does not circulate freely give a bad flavor to the milk. There is a volatile oil in root crops that escapes into the air and is absorded by the milk. This is said to be the reason why milk becomes tainted when these crops are fed. If, then, we wait to cut and feed the roots until after the milk is drawn and taken from the barn, there is little trouble from taint.

Some plants contain a stronger odor than others, cabbage and turnips being more difficult to feed than beets and carrots on account of the taint. If fed after milking root crops make an excellent feed for milk cows.

For root crops you should plow deep, the deeper the better. The roots must grow down into the soil and should have a loose, mellow ground in which to grow; otherwise they penetrate to the bottom of the furrow, strike the hard subsoil and split up into many branches. This gives a poor shaped root and prevents a full growth and a heavy crop.

Beans the Army Ration

Never before has the price of beans for food been so high; never before has the prospect for a strong market been so great. Forty million of men are under arms in Europe. This vast army must be fed. Our own country is mobilizing its troops. Beans are one of the standard army rations and beans are certain to be in large demand; hence the price will continue high.

WHY RAISE BEANS?—Beans are a good crop to grow for several reasons. In the first place they enrich the land, that is they belong to the legume family, all of which have the power of taking nitrogen from the air and adding it to the soil.

In the next place beans grow well on poor soil. The old saying "too poor to grow white beans" indicates that beans will grow on land so poor that it will not produce a crop of anything else. This is literally true, and is due to the fact that beans have the power of using the nitrogen of the air.

In the third place beans are easily grown, cultivated, harvested and stored. They can be kept for years without loss if properly cared for. They have a large amount of good matter in relatively small bulk, hence can be shipped long distances, like wheat, to good advantage.

HOW TO RAISE BEANS.—Beans do well on sandy land but can be grown on any soil. It requires from a peck to a half bushel of navy bean seed to plant an acre, depending on the size of the beans and the distance rows and plants are placed apart.

The ground should be prepared in the usual way as for corn and the beans planted in rows two and a half to three feet apart in the row. They should never be cultivated while the dew is on or while wet with rain as this often injures the leaves and spreads disease from plant to plant if any be present in the field. Early June is the best time for planting in the Northern states.

They should be cultivated shallow as their roots lie very near to the surface. The weeds should be kept down and the cultivator should be run through about four or five times during the season.

HOW TO HARVEST AND STORE.—At harvest time beans may be pulled and stacked in small stacks around a pole. In large fields a bean harvester is used which cuts off the stems of the bean and leaves them in windrows which are dried thoroughly and hauled to the barn, or stacked outside and covered with a tarpaulin to keep out the rain. They are threshed out with a bean thresher or with an ordinary threshing machine from which the concave has been removed. They are stored in shallow bins like wheat. The only care which need be taken is to see that the seed is perfectly dry.

Beans ordinarily yield from ten to twenty bushels per acre, which at the present prices means a pretty penny from an acre of cheap ground.

Sanfoin and Serradella Seed

We have had numerous inquiries from subscribers asking where to get the seed of sanfoin and serradella. We are told that they could not get them from seed houses. The real truth back of this is the fact that these seeds come largely from abroad, the war has cut off importation and the supply available for use in this country is now practically exhausted.

Seed for Root Crops

This is also true of the seeds of root crops. Since the importation of European seeds has been cut off we find a striking shortage in the seeds of root crops on the market. Sugar beet seed is so hard to get that there may not be enough available to plant the usual acreage. This will mean a reduction in yield and a further increase in the price of sugar already too high.

SEED FOR LATE PLANTED CROPS.—It is usual to plants turnips and rutabagas late in June or July, often later, with turnips, since they are a quick-growing crop maturing in six to eight weeks from planting.

Rutabagas are often planted on new cleared land at any odd time in June after the rush of regular spring planting is over. Those who expect to plant any of these crops should procure seeds without delay as the supply is exceedingly short and may be exhausted by the time that this appears in print.

The lesson we should learn from this year's experience is apparent. This country should grow its own seed or another year the situation will be worse than it is this year. Since all root crops are biennials, that is they take two years to grow seed, the only way we can get a crop of seed this year is to save with the greatest of care all seeds that may be produced from roots already in the ground.

Sheep and Lambs in Hot Weather

Shearing should be done early as a heavy fleece of wool makes the sheep terribly uncomfortable and it should be remembered that ticks migrate from the ewes to the lambs at shearing time. If lambs are to be comfortable in hot weather, it is necessary to dip them shortly after shearing the ewes and to repeat the dipping, if an examination shows that either the adult sheep or the lambs are infested with ticks, or if scratching and rubbing show that some cause of irritation is present. If ticks are not present, lice may be found, or in the most severe cases, scab which is caused by parasitic mite and terribly annoying and injurious to sheep. The disease also is so contagious that an affected sheep will soon spread it to every sheep in the flock and the affected animals will not thrive in summer or at any other season of the year. To make lambs comfortable in hot weather it also is necessary to keep their hind parts clean. To that end they should have been docked closely at castration time, or shortly afterward and then the long wool should be kept clipped to prevent fouling with discharges from the bowels and consequent "blowing" by flies and formation of maggots which burrow and cause torture and lack of thrift. Long-tailed lambs are an abomination on this account. They will be sure to scour more or less on grass or other green feed so that fouling and maggot formation can scarcely be avoided. Such lambs also present a poor appearance when sent to market and will be "docked" on that account by the buyer.

Worms of any kind also are a source of discomfort in summer-time and sheep and lambs, therefore, should be protected against them so far as possible. Allowing access to rock salt will help and it is even better to allow them a mixture of one part of powdered tobacco leaves and two parts of salt as a preventive lick. If any lambs or sheep become infested with worms, gasoline should be administered and generous feeding practised. One tablespoonful of gasoline is the average dose. Old sheep take more and young lambs take less. Give it shaken up in four to six ounces of new milk, adding an ounce of raw linseed oil. Great care must be taken not to choke the sheep or lamb when administering this medicine Give it slowly through a piece of rubber hose fitted upon the neck of a bottle, the sheep to be held firmly upon all fours, not set on its rump as so many have advised. The dose may be repeated two or three times at intervals of 24 to 48 hours according to the severity of the symptoms and the judgment of the shepherd. In conclusion it should be advised that sheep and lambs should be sheltered at night in a clean, airy corral fenced securely against dogs which are a serious menace in most localities, while on the range large bands of sheep will, of course, be well guarded against coyotes.

Pigs in Summer

The most common cause of ill-thrift among young pigs in summer and fall is the presence of lung worms (Strongylus paradoxus) in the air passages of the lungs. The affected pigs have a spasmodic, croupy cough and are so distressed thereby and by the failure of the lungs to properly perform their function that the animals fail to thrive, indicated by hard, dry coats, drooping tails and pot bellied condition. There is no satisfactory treatment of this disease so that prevention is the all-important consideration.

The eggs of lung worms are taken in by pigs grazing in old, contaminated pastures, long used by adult swine, which carry the worms through the winter and in spring taint the grass. The old hogs manage to withstand the ill-effects of the worms, showing merely a hacking cough but no appreciable loss of flesh. Young pigs, on the contrary, are very severely affected and may die of pneumonia or prove so thriftless that they are destroyed by the owner. The worms also are derived from filthy feeding troughs and drinking water and apart from this are most likely to be contracted upon low, wet land.

Pigs, as well as other young animals, should not be turned out on old pasture in spring and summer and is far as possible should have clean, sanitary quarters and eating and drinking places. It also should be remembered that worms of all kinds most injuriously affect the pigs that are weak and thriftless to start with. They "add insult to injury," as it were, and the combination kills or prevents profit. It is all-important, therefore, to keep young pigs growing fast and without check. If this can be managed, the worms may not gain the ascendency, but it is, of course, best, if possible, to keep the pigs growing and also free from worms.

Milk is imperative as a feed for all young animals. It has been found, too, that an all grain, or meal of grain, ration is not complete for any growing animal. Milk is needed as a factor for balancing the ration, especially the butter fat of the milk, and to eke out the lack of such fat the leaves as well as the grains of plants are necessary. Alfalfa better than any other feed replaces or serves the purpose of butter fat, and clover, the legumes and flaxseed meal are also useful. It is therefore well to not only provide clean quarters, milk diet, and grain or meals for pigs, but to allow them to pasture green Alfalfa, clover, or rape, etc. and when such green feed cannot be had, to feed them Alfalfa hay.

Pigs in summer also need shade and plenty of water. They dearly love a wallow, but it is better for their health to provide them with clean water for bathing purposes and to put some crude petroleum in the water to help keep down hog lice. Many pigs die each year from overheating, therefore, the necessity of shade and water, and one should be careful, too, not to overdrive hogs in hot weather, or to ship them to market in such weather without placing a heap of ice in the center of the car or arranging to wet the hogs now and then on the trip.

Lastly, it should be mentioned that dust from bedding or yards is very injurious to little pigs and may set up irritation similar to that caused by lung worms and even cause fatal pneumonia. This cause of trouble, therefore, should be eliminated.

The Fly Nuisance

It should be remembered that the work horse is tormented by flies almost as much in the stables as out of it in hot weather. The fly that causes the annoyance in the stables is the little stinging black fly. This pest looks like a common house fly but the wings stand out almost at right angles from the body. It will not sting, if the stable is kept darkened and that should be done during fly time in summer. Gunnysacking will serve the purpose, as it sufficiently excludes light and at the same time allows free circulation of air. It is best, of course, to screen both windows and doors with wire netting. Even if this is done, it is well to darken the stable as some flies are sure to get in and the sacking also subdues the sunlight which is trying to the eyes of horses. Keep the manure piles away from the doors and windows of the stable. They breed flies. Also get out of the bad habit of piling the soiled bedding under the manger to sweat and cause irritating gases.

When the horse has to work or pasture where flies are troublesome, furnish him with a fly net and also spray his unprotected parts with a commercial fly repellant. Often an unsprayed horse is quite bloody from fly biting on coming in at noon and night. The big green-headed fly does the mischief. To such bitten places apply a mixture of one teaspoonful of ammonia (hartshorn) in a cupful of water; or use a solution of one tablespoonful of granular hyposulphite of soda per quart. If any bite on animal or man swells and is painful, immediately swab it with tincture of iodine and repeat the application every 12 hours.

Horse flies which assemble in masses on the backs of pastured cattle cluster about the horns at night and under the belly in wet weather. It is a good plan to apply a mixture of fish oil and oil of tar behind the horns and also on the belly as well as using the fly repellant with a spray pump. Oil of citronella two parts, oil of cedar one part, and spirits of camphor three parts mixed together and applied with an atomizer is effectual in protecting a person against mosquitoes, but is too expensive to use on stock.

It may be added that cheaply constructed fly traps should be used both inside of the stables and about the doors and also around the doors of the kitchen, milk houses and other buildings. They are easily constructed according to plans which can be seen in a bulletin on the subject published and supplied free by the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

Pasture Not Always a Blessing

When, as often is the case, we see brood mares and their foals switching and pawing against a myriad of torturing flies in a corner of a bare, dusty, shadeless pasture in July or August, we conclude that such conditions are cruel, unnecessary and detrimental. Pasture containing grass is a fine place for the mare and her foal, for the cow and calf, ewe and lambs, or sow and pigs, provided adequate shade and water are supplied and it is not too "bare bitten." In almost a majority of instances it would be better to keep the animals mentioned off pasture during the heat of the day and only allow them on it at night, or on cloudy days in the heated term of the year. The bare, permanent pasture is the poorest kind of place for lambs, calves and pigs on account of the danger of lung worms, to say nothing of the ill effects of heat and lack of nourishment.

It may be said, as truly, that the work horse derives little, if any, benefit from the scant pasture at such times. It is fine for him to be allowed to have a roll on grass at noon and a run and rest on it at night, but to turn him out on it, without adequate shade and water during the heat of the day is positive cruelty and also highly unprofitable. Indeed, it is thought best by many experienced farmers to keep their horses off pasture during the season of the year when they have to work hardest and at such times to feed oats, wheat bran, a little ear corn, and sound, old hay in preference to green grass. The latter keeps the horses soft and with bowels relaxed, whereas the dry feed maintains muscular condition. As soon as the hard work is over, however, it is well to turn the horses out to grass and that also is beneficial, if a horse has sore feet or any derangement of the digestive organs. The pasture is also the best place for idle horses and growing colts, if not overstocked, but producing sufficient feed and also provided with shade and abundant water.

Penny Wise, Pound Foolish

That is a trite but true saying and we saw it well illustrated the other day. Men in a little country village had united and subscribed the money necessary to open a three foot ditch, with a new type of ditching plow pulled by eighteen horses, for the purpose of getting rid of the surface water which stood on the low ground around the village after every big rain. The outlet was a lake some two miles away and the farmers who owned the land on the outskirts of the village and right of way of the ditch subscribed their share for the improvement. They knew that the ditch would get rid of the surplus water on a part of their farms and provide an outlet or main drain into which they might later run laterals for the drying of many fields. They gladly paid their share of the expense and no doubt will find the investment a paying one. But one man refused to join with the others. He was the last farmer on the line of ditch and three hundred rods of ditch would have to be opened through his place to get rid of the water or connect with the lake. The cost of the ditch would be fifty cents a rod or $150; but he would not pay that amount and so the ditch had to stop at the edge of his land and he will receive all of the water from the ditch in addition to that already on his low-lying farm. We suppose that he intends to open the remaining portion of the ditch "by hand," or employ some method that he thinks will cost less than the sum mentioned. If so he is making a sad mistake. He can never get the ditching crew, their big machine and eighteen horses, to come back for his little length of ditch. They would do the work now for $150, but to return and make a new "set" would cost much more. The hard work will probably not be done quickly or thoroughly, if at all. The penny wise pound foolish farmer will be "drowned out" and also will lessen the efficiency of the ditch for his neighbors. It would have been wise for him to chip in with the rest and reap the full benefits of the work. That is true in all such instances. It never pays a man to refuse to take part in a sane and necessary drainage proposition, or in a line fencing operation. Cooperation pays.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming.

Questions and Answers

SERRADELLA.—Kindly give all information, price, etc., on grass called serradella. Where can seed be obtained? What is the price, and how much should be sown per acre? MRS. M. K., Plover, Wis.

A.—Serradella is still in the experimental stage in the U. S. Very little has yet been published about this plant. Send to seedsmen for their quotation on seed. Sow at the rate of 40 to 50 pounds per acre.

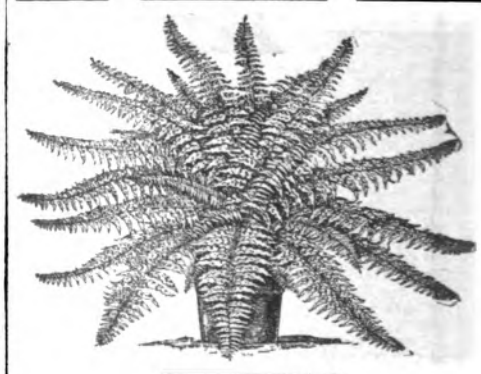
SERRADELLA.—Please tell me where to get serradella seed and how much to sow to the acre. Would it be a successful crop in Wisconsin?

M. J. J., Larson, Wis.

A.—Get seed of nearest seedsman. Sow at the rate of 40 or 50 lbs. per acre. Clover is a more satisfactory crop for your section.

SUGAR BEETS.—I wish to know whether sugar beets will grow in North Carolina. Where can I get the seed? What are they worth per pound? How much seed is required to plant an acre? Are they good feed for stock?

Miss D. C., Randleman, N. C.



A.—Successful sugar beet culture on a large scale depends upon the nearness to factory. There are no such factories in the South. Send to seedsmen for seed. Beets this year are contracted for by the factories at from $6.00 to $7.00 per ton. Good soil produces 15 to 25 tons per acre. They are excellent food for stock, especially dairy cows. Try a small patch. They can be planted late in the South.

Four Beautiful Ferns

PREMIUM NO. 6112
Given For Two Subscriptions

OF all indoor folisge plants, none give more lasting pleasure and satisfaction than these popular house ferns. They need but little care and live indefinitely, growing larger and more beautiful year by year. The collection offered you here comprise four of the largest, handsomest varieties ever grown for house culture. They are the Asparagus Plumosus or "Lace" fern, the Roosevelt, the Boston or "Fountain" fern and the Whitmani or "Ostrich plume" fern. They will thrive in any dwelling room near a window and require almost no attention except a little sprinkling of water now and then. These ferns are guaranteed to be absolutely free from all injurious insects or diseases which destroy foliage plants of this type, and they will be packed carefully and mailed to you by Parcel Post so that you will be sure to receive them in just as good condition as though they were fresh from the greenhouse. We are able to illustrate only one variety, "The Roosevelt," but remember you get all four ferns free on this offer.

Club Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you by Parcel Post prepaid the above described collection of four beautiful ferns each one of them a strong, healthy, well rooted plant ready to pot and guaranteed to grow and develop into a fine specimen beauty. Premium No. 6112.

Forcing Chickens for Breeders and Layers

SOME say, "don't force the chicks intended for breeders and layers," but I have found that chicks that are grown rapidly return the most money. We would not force the pullets to lay before they secure their growth by the use of stimulants, condiments and emmenagogues, but pullets that are grown quickly on a good healthy diet will mature their bodies before ripening their egg organs.

Pullets that are grown in the open air consume a larger amount of food and put it to a good use. The body will reach full development before she drops an egg. The ovary (the egg producing organ) is largely dependent on heat for its growth, and sometimes by keeping chicks long in heated brooders, close housing and feeding a stimulating, heat producing ration we can cause them to lay before the body has matured, and in that case the body will not mature to large size, or even full size for the breed. The ovary has ripened before the body has matured. Such pullets will never make good layers for any length of time, and their eggs are usually under size. It is probably because of having grown such pullets that writers have warned us not to force birds intended for breeders or layers.

When pullets are grown right—given room, airy coops at night, free range or large yard and fed a wholesome ration, there is no danger of their developing too fast.

When chicks are eight weeks old, they should be separated from their mothers, and the families divided; the young pullets being relegated to colony coops in an orchard or partly shaded meadow, where they will have extensive free range; the cockerels being placed in the semi-confinement of wards, as their ultimate fate is the frying pan, which necessitates plump bodies, while free range would only develop frame and muscle.

Our colony houses are six feet long, three feet wide, thirty-six inches high in front, and twenty-four inches at the back. They are made of light scantling, the ends, back and roof being covered with roofing paper; and the front, to within eight inches of the ground, with unbleached muslin, which insures perfect ventilation and prevents rain beating in upon the birds when they are on the roosts, which are fixed a foot from the bottom and nine inches from the back of the coop. Two holes are made, nine inches apart, in the middle of each end of the coop, and a heavy rope knotted through them, to form handles.

The coops having no flooring, and the whole construction being light, they are easily removed to fresh ground every week, and so kept clean with little trouble—an important item when there is a large quantity being used. Having a large orchard, we placed the coops in rows thirty feet apart, as two sides of the orchard adjoin woodland, through which a never failing spring stream runs, so the birds have a splendid range.

Twenty birds are placed in each coop. The first week a portable yard, five feet long, is placed in front of each coop, so that the young chicks cannot wander off and get lost, as they surely would in strange quarters. During that time a self-feeding hopper and a drinking fountain are placed inside of the coop. When the yard is removed, the individual vessels are dispensed with, large drinking tubs and food hoppers being stationed midway between every four coops, to reduce time and labor in caring for the birds.

The large hoppers are nothing more than boxes, five feet long, two feet wide and six inches deep, over which is placed an A-shaped cover, made of slats, one inch apart, to prevent the birds getting into the box and scratching the grain on to the ground, where it will be wasted. For water, five gallon kegs are used, with an automobile escape, which keeps a small pan continually full. Both feed and water are placed under a rough shelter, to protect them from sun and rain. Using such large receptacles, it is only necessary to fill them every other day.

Feed consists of a dry mash, composed of ten pounds of wheat bran, ten pounds of ground oats, one pound of white middlings, one pound of old process oil meal, and ten pounds of beef scraps well mixed. In addition to that, they receive at night a feed of wheat and cracked corn, two parts of the former to one of the latter. About half a pint is scattered in front of each coop about four p. m.

Grit is supplied in large quantities. Being near a stone crusher, we buy the screenings by the cart load and dump it in heaps on the outskirts of the orchard, where it does not show, but is quite accessible to the chicks.

On these rations, without any variation, the pullets are kept until September, when they are transferred to their winter quarters.

Pullets which have to be grown in confinement should have a well-littered coop of good size, and having large openings. That is, the greater portion of one side should be wire. The pullets should not be crowded nor should they be grown in large flocks. They should be fed practically the same as those on free range. They should have the dry mash before mentioned, grit, charcoal and shells, and be fed grain and green food. Where the green food is lettuce, lawn clippings or garden refuse, they should have two grain feeds a day, and this should be scattered in litter, not too deep. Where sprouted oats are used for greens, one feed a day of hard grain is sufficient.

Cockerels and old hens should not be allowed with growing pullets. Where cockerels are allowed to run with pullets neither will mature to full size. Too often we see cockerels and pullets allowed free range on the farm, and all allowed to mix together. Good stock cannot be grown in this manner, and the future egg yield of the flock will not be as large as it would be if more care were given the growing stock.

Cockerels intended for breeders should have every advantage that will tend to full and perfect development, and I prefer, when possible, to give them free range, isolated from hens and pullets. Next to free range comes large yards with well-littered, roomy coops or roosts out of doors. Good cockerels as I ever raised lived all summer in a large yard without a coop. Poles were set up in the shade of a large apple tree, and on these the cockerels roosted. In event of a storm they sought the protection of a tree. They were a hardy close feathered bunch, and stood the rigors of a severe winter in an open house with the utmost comfort. At best they should only have a roof to protect them from rain.

Hawks and crows often make life a burden to the poultryman in chicken time, where the growing chicks range. It is a good plan to erect poles about the chicken range, and run wire or strong twine zigzag from these, high enough to allow head room. From these lines suspend at frequent intervals strips of white and colored cloth, bright bits of tin and pieces of glass. This is the most effective crow and hawk scare we know of, and it is well worth the expense and labor. Crows often become so bold that no other scarecrow will keep them from stealing young chicks, especially if bits of bright tin and glass are hung so that they will jingle in the breeze. Hawks generally come at the same time every day, so can easily be watched and shot.

Rats cause losses, and will frequently kill and hide a large number of chicks in a single night. Make the coops rat proof. Raise coops and boxes often, and kill any rats found beneath. A good rat dog is a great help. Traps are seldom effective, and poison is not safe in chicken time.

One of the most difficult problems which the poultry keeper has to meet is that of keeping his stock and poultry houses reasonably free from lice, mites and other external parasites.

In keeping a poultry plant free from lice there are two points of attack; one, the birds themselves; the other, the houses, nest boxes, roosting boards, etc.

In using any kind of lice powder on the birds themselves, it should always be remembered that a single application of powder is not sufficient. When there are lice present on a bird, there are always unhatched eggs of lice (nits) present, too. The proper procedure is to follow up a first application of powder with a second at an interval of four days to a week. If the birds are badly infested at the beginning it may be necessary to make still a third application. To clean the cracks and crevices of the woodwork of the houses and nests of vermin, a liquid spray or paint is probably the most desirable form of application.

A splendid lice powder may be made at a cost of only a few cents a pound in the following way: Take three parts of gasoline and one part of crude carbolic acid; mix these together and add gradually with stirring, enough plaster of Paris to take up all the moisture. The liquid and the dry plaster should be thoroughly mixed and stirred so that the liquid will be uniformly distributed through the mass of plaster. When enough plaster has been added, the resulting mixture should be a dry, pinkish brown powder, having a fairly strong carbolic odor and a rather less pronounced gasoline odor.

Do not use more plaster in mixing than is necessary to blot up the liquid. This powder is to be worked into the feathers of the birds affected with vermin. The bulk of the application should be in the fluff around the vent and on the ventral side of the body, and in the fluff under the wings. Its efficiency, which is greater than that of any other known to the writer, can be very easily demonstrated by any one to his own satisfaction. Take a bird that is covered with lice and apply the powder in the manner just described. After the lapse of about a minute, shake the bird, loosening its feathers with the fingers at the same time, over a clean piece of paper. Dead and dying lice will drop on the paper in great numbers. Any one who will try this experiment will have no further doubt of the wonderful efficiency and value of this powder.

For a spray or paint to be applied to roosting boards, nest boxes, or the walls and floor of the henhouses the following preparation is used: Three parts of kerosene and one part crude carbolic acid. This is stirred up when used, and may be applied with any of the hand spray pumps or with a brush.

In both of these formula it is highly important that crude carbolic acid be used instead of the purified product. Be sure and insist to the druggist on getting crude carbolic acid. It is a dark brown, dirty looking liquid, and its value depends on the fact that it contains tar oil and tar bases in addition to the pure phenol (carbolic acid.)

So many of this month's inquiries have been about preventives or cures for gapes and bowel trouble, that I will take them for my text instead of trying to answer the individual letters. Bowel trouble usually attacks brooder chickens—perhaps I should have said incubator chickens which have been reared in a brooder—more frequently than it does chicks under hens, and the cause is usually want of sufficient heat. Little chicks can't stand being chilly. If you notice even when hens are brooding, they will suffer if the hen happens to be a restless wanderer, and a cold, damp spell strikes us late in the spring. The brooder must me warm and well ventilated, and there should be a sheltered yard for them to exercise in for the first two or three weeks. If you are running a heated brooder, use a thermometer, and see that it keeps steadily at 95. If you have adopted the new fireless brooder, put plenty of cotton at the top, and never have less than twenty-five chicks to a brooder, for any less than that number can't supply sufficient bodily heat to warm up the air inside of the brooder. It is also well to cover the bottom of the brooder box with hay sweepings or cut hay, which is warm and soft for the little chicks to lie on. It is also very important to see that they go into their brooder at night, for they are very apt to run into some corner and huddle together, and of course become chilled before morning. Watch the droppings of all chickens, both brooder and those under the hens, and at the slightest indication of looseness of the bowels, remove the drinking water and replace with cold tea or rice water. It is a good precaution to feed boiled rice two or three times a week whilst the chicks are little, and if they develop any serious trouble, keep them under cover; or if with the hen, keep the hen shut into the brooder coop, for she is much more likely to brood then than when allowed to run alone.

Leg weakness rarely if ever develops if the chickens are properly fed. Green food and animal food must form part of their rations. There is a meat meal on the market which is very good if you can buy in small quantities, but it is not safe to buy a large bag which cannot be used up within two or three weeks, so it is usually better for the ordinary farm to depend on curd cheese and an occasional hard-boiled egg, chopped up fine without removing the shell. And for green stuff I don't think there is anything as good as young clover and the young sprouts of onions, of course, chopped fine enough to be acceptable for little chicks. If you are where you can get beef's liver, it is the best of all animal food, when about half boiled and chopped fine and fed in small quantities. If your birds have had any kind of animal meat from the start, it is quite safe; but if you suddenly commence feeding it after four or five weeks, you must go very carefully for some time until they become accustomed to it. A rusty nail or two, with a few drops of tincture of iron in the drinking water is a good tonic, and it is advisable to use it if chickens commence to look pale around the gills, or droopy in any way.

As I have explained before in these columns, gapes is really not a disease at all, but a parasite worm about one sixteenth of an inch in length, and like a thin thread. They lodge in the windpipe and suck the blood of their victim. They are supposed to materialize only on ground on which poultry droppings have been deposited for several seasons. For this reason it is best to try and locate the brooder coops on fresh ground each year, or have the ground where they have stood heavily dressed with lime and plowed in in the fall. These wretched little worms multiply very quickly if they are not removed from the bird's throat, for the little chicks have not strength to eject them, no matter how much they cough and choke. Some of the remedies are as follows: Dip the end of a small wing feather in turpentine, push it down the bird's throat, turn two or three times quickly, and pull it out. The worm may come with it, but it is so small that it is always difficult to tell. Another is, to mix salt and water, or steep tobacco in water for ten minutes, pour a teaspoonful down the bird's throat; keep the head up, and the two holes at the base of the bill covered with the thumb and forefinger whilst you count five; release, and suddenly turn the bird upside down, holding by the feet. It will gasp, splutter, and usually eject the worm. But really, I think it is much better to make a practise to put the coops on clean ground, for trying to doctor little chicks is awfully difficult work.

Grain is likely to remain so high in price through the winter that every farmer must try to conserve every available home product. First among the food crops I count clover and corn; to be of the most value, clover should be cut early and cured in the cock, and not be allowed to become wet or sunburned. Clover rowen, or second crop, is no better than early cut hay, but that which has ripened its seed and been through the thrashing machine is little more nutritious than poor hay or straw.

Next among the grains I place millet and Kafir corn. The former is the most valuable for the midday feed, and also for small chicks. I prefer the new Japanese millet, which can be grown in any of the New England states, and if sown early will ripen a good crop of seed. It is not necessary to thrash grain; let it remain on the straw, and throw a forkful into the scratching pen each day. The straw makes good material for the hens to scratch in, keeps the house warm and fosters exercise.

Kafir corn is grown the same as Indian corn, and harvested in a similar manner. In feeding it the heads should be cut off and thrown into the scratching pen whole, and the stalks fed to the cow or horse. This corn is very similar to Indian corn in nutritive value, containing a trifle less of protein and fat. When harvested, Kafir corn can be bound in bundles and set up against the side of the poultry-house to cure if shelter cannot be provided for it. In this manner it serves the double purpose of food and a protection to the building.

Buckwheat should not be omitted from the list of grains. It can usually be grown on land from which another crop has been taken the same season. From the first to the eighth of July is about the right time to sow it. It is a good plan to feed this grain on the straw also, but a small crop can be threshed out very easily with the flail.

Sunflowers should be planted in every by-place, also in the runs. If the plants are protected until they get a start, they will keep out of the reach of the poultry, and afford them shade during the hot summer days.

Some poultrymen highly recommend the Australian salt-bush, and from what I have seen of it I deem it a most valuable plant. Poultry of all kinds highly relish it, and it seems to be very nutritious. It is fed green, or cured as hay and cut up. It will remain green all winter, and will stand twenty degrees below zero. One pound of seed will plant an acre, which will produce from fifteen to twenty-five tons of green forage.

S. L. P.—There are several makes of corrugated boxes on the market, specially constructed for shipping eggs by parcel post. I think postage will be rather heavy from your state to New York. Better ask at your local post-office.

H. H.—The hen was naturally lazy, and acquired so much fat that it affected the egg organs. When hens develop an abnormal amount of fat in the intestines, it causes all manner of troubles. As you possibly know by cleaning fowls for the table, a hen who is laying or about to lay, has a large bunch of yolks, varying in size from a pinhead to a fully developed yolk, which lie near the backbone. As each yolk reaches its full size, it becomes detached from the bunch, and drops into a passage called the oviduct, and it is during its journey through that passage that it becomes enclosed in the white, and later the shell. When these parts are compressed by excessive fat in the intestines, all sorts of freaky conditions are apt to arise. In the case of your hen, the mouth of the oviduct must have been so weakened that it did not open to receive the yolk when it was detached, or retain the liquid which constitutes the white, and the lumps you found were a mixture of yolk and white, which had been held back and partly cooked by the heat of the body. It was probably the first of a new clutch of eggs, and if you had not killed the hen, she might have laid an egg which, on being opened, would have had the appearance of an old, rotten egg. But it is much more likely that the mass would have commenced to decompose in the bird's body, and caused a poisonous condition which would have killed her, or in the effort to lay, she might have broken a blood vessel in the brain, and have been found dead on the nest. Killing her just when you did, there had been no time for the mass to commence to rot, and the flesh was in no way affected, and so quite wholesome for food. If you have many of your old hens that appear very fat, I advise you to kill them for the table, and if you have any doubts about the condition of the flock, add a teaspoonful of magnesia to every quart of drinking water once every third day until they have had three doses.

Your second letter, describing the condition of the duck, is answered, by the above, for it is undoubtedly a case of a ruptured egg passage. Ducks should be fed on a mixture of ground corn, oats, wheat bran, made into a mash with an equal quantity of cooked green vegetables, chopped and steamed clover and Alfalfa hay.

L. B.—As the birds have all been running together, I don't think it would be safe to use the eggs for hatching after dividing the varieties, for at least three weeks.

M. K.—Feeding one hundred hens and getting only from one to three eggs a day is dreadful. I try to impress on all our readers the mistake of keeping mixed flocks of mongrels. This is only one proof of how unprofitable they are. Better have ten birds of one good variety and get four or five eggs a day. Your method of feeding is good, especially as the birds have the run of the farm, but during the winter any sort of fowls must have animal and vegetable food, or they can't produce eggs.

B. O. B.—If the hen never lays a normal-sized egg, there must be some malformation of the egg organs. Hens often lay a few small eggs at the end of the clutch. I fear there is no remedy for the case.

L. J. Z.—You seem to be feeding heavily on very rich foods. Boiled potato skins, buckwheat, table scraps, animal meal and corn, are all very fattening, and as you only have fifteen hens to feed three times a day, it is more than likely that the birds are being overfed, and the bird who died was the first to break down. Her symptoms all suggest acute indigestion. Better cut out all of the above mentioned foods; give scratch feed in the morning, green vegetables at noon, and oats, or oats and wheat, at night. Add a teaspoonful of magnesia to a quart of drinking water once a week for three weeks.

E. W.—The fault may have been with the breeding stock. If it were old and excessively fat or poor and inbred, but most likely it was the method in which the incubator was run. If the heat ran up and down in an uncertain manner, or went below 103½ during the last twenty-four hours, the chicks would lose strength through the hatch being delayed, and that would account, for the yolk not being drawn into the abdomen. The convulsive fits which you describe are nearly always the result of uneven temperature. Thermometers are not always to be trusted. They should be tested each season. Read the January and March numbers of COMFORT.

An Old Subscriber.—The first part of the department this month tells about coops.

F. F. F.—The heat was not sufficient in the machine, or you cooled the eggs too long each day. In a cellar, where the temperature is below fifty degrees, half an hour twice a day is too much, especially if you remove the lamp to trim and fill during that time, for the temperature in the egg chamber would run down so low that it would take several hours to reach 103 again. VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any question privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing as above.

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

WIND GALLS.—My horse as wind puffs that are started on both front ankles. Can you tell me a cure and also what causes them? L. W.

A.—These are distensions of the synovial bursæ of the joints or tendon sheaths from strain and they are practically incurable. Pressure from bandages does some good temporarily, when fully established wind galls do not cause lameness.

FISTULA.—I have a mare nine years old that has a running sore between her jaw bones. There is a hole about as big around as a pencil clear through. I would like your advice. A. L.

A.—The discharging pipe (sinus) no doubt connects with the root of a diseased bone. These should be removed by a skilled surgeon. Meanwhile inject a little of a two per cent solution of protargol once daily. This is expensive but effective.

CALLOUS.—I have a seven-year-old mare that had a fistula last September. It healed but left a knot on two of her withers. I will appreciate any information. L. V. McL.

A.—Better leave the knot alone. If could only be removed by dissection and that possibly might cause recurrence of the fistula.

WEAK MULE.—My father has a mule four years old. He seems to be loose where his hips join the back bone. In walking he spreads his hind legs, falls down and can't get up without help. He has been this way since last November. R. N. O.

A.—The mule may have strained the muscles of the loins, but such symptoms may also indicate "swamp fever" which is incurable. Let the mule run on grass this summer and be given additional feed. He may then gradually recover.

BLOAT.—Last spring I bought lambs from the sheepmen when a few hours old. I fed them fresh milk from a bottle, and when two weeks old gave them skim-milk. After feeding them skim-milk they would eat grass, bloat up and die. Did I feed them right? E. M.

A.—Add an ounce of limewater to each pint of skim-milk when you start feeding that and they should do better. Also be careful to feed often and only small quantities at a time.

STRINGHALT.—I have a three-year-old mare that is stringhalted. Will she outgrow it? She is not as bad as she was two years ago. Is there a remedy? Subscriber.

A.—She will not be likely to outgrow the disease but it may be remedied with a fair degree of success by the operation of peroneal tenotomy to be performed by a trained veterinarian.

WEAK CALF.—A two-year-old heifer had a calf. It bawled a good deal and only lived four hours. The heifer was in good condition and is doing first rate. She was fed on plenty of oat green feed and a little Timothy hay and all the salt and water she wanted. She had a stable to run in. The calf seemed to be too weak to hold up his head. Could you tell me what was the matter with the calf? MRS. N. P. M.

A.—The heifer was inadequately fed and could not be expected to produce a strong calf. Feed clover or Alfalfa hay, oats, corn and bran and such weak calves will become rare. Contagious abortion may, however, cause similar weakness.

SLOBBERING.—I have a mare six years old. She has trouble in trying to eat corn or hay. She wets the cobs as much as though they had been in water. MRS. I. G.

A.—It seems perfectly clear that the teeth or some foreign body in the mouth cause both slobbering and difficulty in mastication and you should take the horse to a different graduate veterinarian for proper examination and treatment. It may be that milk tooth crowns or shells of molar teeth have lodged and need removing.

LAME COW.—I have a fine young milk cow which has a disease of the feet that is called crack-heel. Please tell me what to do for it. MRS. F. K. W.

A.—You have not described the condition present so we cannot give a confident opinion. Cleanse the foot and cut away all rotten or loose horn, then immerse for a few moments in a solution of two ounces of sulphate of copper (blue stone) in a pint of water used hot. Afterwards soak oakum daily in a five per cent solution of coal tar disinfectant and bind upon the foot.

COUGH.—Could you tell me what is the matter with my brother-in-law's horse? He groans when he lies down. He has a cough, also a discharge from the nose, of a tough whitish color. It falls in the watering trough when he drinks. E. C.

A.—Heaves possibly is present. Try feeding him on grass alone in summer. Twice daily give him a tablespoonful of Fowler's solution of arsenic. As there always is a possibility of glanders in such a case it would be well to have an examination made by a trained veterinarian.

BLOAT COLIC.—What is the best thing to do for cow that has bloat or for horse when it has colic? What is best remedy for him? Give him physic at once? What shall I give him? O. K.

A.—Give two ounces of turpentine or a tablespoonful of formaldehyde in a quart of milk. The cow may first have to be tapped in the left flank with a trocar and canula for removal of gas from the paunch. There are several kinds of colic. Usually an ounce or two of turpentine and an ounce of landanum will give relief. A bloated horse also has to be tapped high up in the right flank for removal of gas.

WARTS.—I have a cow which has warts on all four teats. What can I do to get rid of them? MRS. J. N.

A.—Rub in best Castor oil after each milking, or use olive oil or fresh goose grease and the warts may in time disappear. Those having narrow necks may be snipped off with scissors, a few at a time. Lightly rub with a lunar caustic pencil if they start growing again.

WARTS.—Can you give any information in regard to warts on cows' bags and on milkers' hands? What can be done for them? C. C. S.

A.—See answer to Mrs. J. N.

GROWTH.—I have a yearling colt that has a bleeding wart just below the ear and near the eye. Could you tell me anything that will help it? J. G.

A.—This possibly is not a wart but the opening of a fistula connecting with a supernumerary molar tooth which could be removed by a veterinarian. If no such condition is found present he should carefully remove the growth by dissection and then cauterize the wound.

WARBLES.—Can you tell me what caused two of my heifers to have worms under their hides? One was squeezed out by the hired man. It was an inch long and as large as the end of the little finger. Will they injure the animals? What can be done to prevent them? They were out all last summer. Could it be anything they got last summer? M. F. G.

A.—The grubs are the larvæ of the ox warble fly (hypoderma lineate) hatched from eggs deposited by the fly in summer. Keep flies off by spraying the cows with commercial fly repellant during summer. Squeeze out and destroy each ripe grub. This is easily accomplished by placing the open mouth of a large bottle upon the "boil" and squeezing down hard. You need not fear to use the milk.

GRUBS.—In my April number of COMFORT I saw your answer to E. S. in regard to the Gadfly grubs. You say to prevent them to smear pine tar on the nose of the sheep in flytime. Will you please tell how often it would be necessary to apply the tar? I have taken COMFORT a number of years. J. N. P.

A.—Keep the noses daubed with pine tar, or a mixture of pine tar, grease and crude carbolic acid as long as flies are troublesome and often enough to protect the sheep. A good plan is to make large auger holes in a squared log. Keep them filled with salt for the sheep to lick and keep tar dashed on the edge of the holes.

The Japanese Way To Remove Corns Don't Hurt a Bit--Easy and Simple

The Magic Touch of Ice-Mint Does It. Just a Touch Stops Soreness, Then the Corn of Callous Shrivels and Lifts Off. Try it. Your Feet Will Feel Cool and Fine.

Just a touch of Ice-mint and "Oh!" what relief. Corns and callouses vanish, soreness disappears and you can dance all night or walk all day and your corns won't hurt a bit. No matter what you have tried or how many times you have been disappointed here is a real help for you at last. From the very second that Ice-mint touches that sore, tender corn your poor tired, aching feet will feel so cool, easy and comfortable that you will just sigh with relief. Think of it; just a little touch of that delightful, cooling Ice-mint and real foot joy is yours. No matter how old or tough your pet corn is he will shrivel right up and you can pick him out after a touch of Ice-mint. No pain, not a bit of soreness, either when applying it or afterwards, and it doesn't even irritate the skin.

Ice-mint is the real Japanese secret of fine, healthy, little feet. Prevents foot odors and keeps them cool, sweet and comfortable. It is now selling like wildfire here.

Just ask in any drug store for a little Ice-mint and give your poor suffering, tired feet the treat of their lives. There is nothing better, nor nothing "just as good." Advt.

Nerine's Second Choice

"Tommy! I've dropped Tommy!" And she gazed anxiously backward and forward. "Oh, I see him and he'll be run over! Tommy! Tommy!"

She tore straight into the path of the galloping horse, where sat Tommy, placidly licking his whiskers.

Nerine's heart bounded.

The sun was straight in the eyes of the man on the horse; ten to one he could not see them.

"Remain where you are, May! Don't come!" she cried sharply. She flew after Joan, who was racing blindly for Tommy.

"Joan!" what a shout come from her young throat.

It was just in time that she reached the child and dragged her back—too late if her shriek of desperation had not been so loud and clear. For the man heard and saw her just in time, and swerved—swerved just clear of the girl and child, but, alas! full over the luckless Tommy!

The flying hoofs struck and sent him into the air; he would never again sit in the sun and whisk his tail, never more bite unwary fingers.

Joan wrenched her shoulder from Nerine and ran to her beloved rat. Nerine, somewhat breathless from her fright, ran after her. Over at the point the man had stopped his horse and then came trotting back to them.

Both were stooping over Tommy, who lay still and limp on the sand. There was not a mark on the poor little beast, but he was dead.

"I beg your pardon very much." Nerine looked up to see the chestnut horse which had done the mischief close beside her, and the man in the act of dismounting. "I am afraid," slipping the bridle over his arm, "that I frightened you."

Nerine started. Where had she heard that slow drawl?

"Mr. Fairfax!" she said, looking at the strong, thin face, which was a little white, for Fairfax had the very uncomfortable knowledge that if he had not heard the girl shout he must have run straight over the child. For a moment he stared blankly; then he remembered her.

"Miss Lispenard!" he said, rather stupidly. "How do you do?"

Nerine had grown pale in her turn; the man reminded her so keenly of that hateful ball.

"Do you know," she said, grimly, "that you nearly rode over my little cousin?"

Mr. Fairfax was not given to humility, but he spoke very humbly now.

"I have to thank you that I did not. I never saw you till you shouted. I never thought of there being any one in this lonely place."

"You might have looked," shrieked Joan. With tears pouring down her pretty face she stamped her foot at him. "Just see what you've done. My Tommy is dead!"

Fairfax gazed in wild surprise on the dingy white animal. He had never been acquainted with anyone who took a rat about as though it were a dog.

Nerine explained, and he put his hand on the defunct Tommy with real sorrow.

"You shan't touch him!" Joan sat down on the sand still clasping Tommy. Her tears choked her tongue. "Oh, my Tommy!" she sobbed.

"Hush! Joan darling," Nerine said softly. "Let me have Tommy." And she took him up carefully. "Look!" in an undertone, "he is quite dead."

Fairfax felt poor Tommy's heart.

"I'm afraid he is," ruefully. "What a careless beast I was!"

He looked from the white rat in his hand to the sobbing Joan. Poor little girl! What could he say to her? He had never felt such a fool in his life, or so wantonly unkind.

"Poor Tommy!" May said. "Come, Joan, let's go home and bury him."

Joan shrieked.

"I won't, I won't never bury my Tommy! I won't dig a hole in the nasty earth and put him in." She clutched Nerine frantically.

"Joan!" Fairfax said suddenly, and something in his voice stopped the frantic sobs. "Look here; of course you don't want to bury him. You give him to me, and I will bring him back just exactly as if he were alive, stuffed, you know, like——" He hesitated.

"Like mother's canary she had when she was a little girl?" Joan stopped crying as she asked her question. "Can you make him keep for always like that?"

"Always," Fairfax affirmed.

Joan surveyed him anxiously, then she suddenly sidled up to him.

"You wouldn't never bury him, would you? Will you bring him back tomorrow?"

"No, not tomorrow, but in a few days." He looked at Nerine. Where was he to take the beloved when the taxidermist was done with him?

Miss Lispenard explained.

"But won't it be a trouble to you?" she said. "Will you have to send him to London?"

"Oh, no! Only to the next town. It is only five miles from me; I live just about there," pointing vaguely, inland. "You are sure she would rather have this poor animal stuffed than get a new one?"

"Quite sure," gravely. And with some wonder she watched him put all that remained of Tommy into his pocket, and unforbidden by Joan, ride away.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

M. T., Lascassas, Tenn.—There isn't any "latest stile reply to give a young man when Interduced" because the same old style still prevails, which is to say that you are pleased to meet him. Of course, this doesn't mean anything, but it sounds pleasant, and the great mass of people who are introduced haven't originality enough to say any new thing which would be just as good form and quite as pleasant, not to mention the fact that they might really mean what they said if they made up on the spot what they said. Do you grasp the idea? Now, if you are not like the great mass and can say something pleasant and pertinent, not impertinent on the occasion of an introduction, go right ahead and do it regardless of any rules of etiquette.

Miss H. B. E., Brooklyn, N. Y.—As you are about to write to a man you do not know and you ask us what you should write, we will, as a friend, suggest that you begin by asking him if he is a married man, or an ex-convict, or a white slaver, or any one of the others of dozens of undesirable things he might be as far as you know. Tell him that as a lady you ought to know what kind of a man you are corresponding with and as a gentleman he ought to tell you, no matter whether it is to his credit or not. You may not think it makes any difference what kind of a man you are writing to, but really it does, because it would be most embarrassing to you after three or four months of correspondence you should find out that he was not only married, but was an ex-convict as well. At least, it seems to us that you would feel rather embarrassed, especially if your letters had become somewhat tender and he showed them around to his pals. As a strict matter of etiquette don't write to strange men.

Cat's Eye, Passaic, N. J.—If a lady does not know what kind of a birthday present she wants and cannot tell the gentleman donor when he asks her, she should be satisfied with anything he may choose for her. Etiquette prescribes no rules in such cases.

Blue Eyes, Petrolia, Cal.—When a young wife, living in the country, has an opportunity to go to the dances and other occasional social divertisements of the community and her husband will not go with her simply because he doesn't want to go, or doesn't want her to go, we are almost tempted to tell her she should take on a little of the spirit of the modern woman of progress and go without him. A woman in her home all day needs some change and if she likes community society, we think her husband, even if he, having been out and around all day, does not want to go out in the evening, should be sufficiently considerate of her needs to go with her, or to make proper arrangements for her to go without him. Only the wholly selfish man will insist upon his wife staying at home all the time, and if at last she can endure it no longer and breaks away to the discredit of all, the husband is more to blame than the wife is. Many city wives go too much and neglect homes and husbands for their own selfish pleasure, but opportunities in the country are not such as they are in the city and husbands should be willing to make some concessions, even though they might not enjoy doing it. Why don't you organize a Wives' Protective Association in your community and start a compaign of social education for all husbands? That may sound like a joke to you, but it is really a serious proposition worth considering. We think your husband would hardly dare object to your attending the meetings of such an organization.

S. R. L., Mullen, S. Dak.—Wear your hair in the style that is most becoming to you no matter what the fashion book style is. You may follow the fashions in clothes, however ugly and unbecoming they may be, but your hair is part of you and you have no right to wear it any way except as will become you most. (2) The same kind of manners prevail at box suppers as elsewhere, and the gentleman always shows every deference to the lady. Make up the box to suit yourself. (3) "You are welcome," or just "Welcome" is hardly the proper response to the gentleman who thanks the lady for the dance. A bow and a smile are better, or some nice little speech appropriate to the occasion, which must be spontaneous.

Gray Eyes, Mason City, Iowa.—Lots of girls are too nervous to be good switchboard girls and if you are feeling that way about it, you should quit the telephone for other employment. If you like clerking and can get a good position, take it. Remember in whatever work you do that that which you like best you can do best and although it may not pay as some other work that you might do, the pleasure in your work more than balances the difference in the pay. If you have no interest in any work except the money you can make out of it, you will never excel at anything and never be worth much money to any employer.

Worried, Kendrick, Ida.—There is no disgrace in divorce if you are the innocent party and while we do not believe in seeking divorce, except in extreme cases, we do believe that it is better than to suffer and waste one's life merely for convention's sake. If you are frank with your husband and tell him that you will not live with him unless he changes his manner of life and treats you as a good wife should be treated, he may realize that he has reached the limit and must reform. Give him six months' time and if he does not change, then go back to your parents' home and make the separation permanent. It's not every woman who would have endured what you have for nine years. And whatever you do, be sure that in all things your own conduct is above reproach and beyond gossip.

Little Orphan, Demopolis, Ala.—It is quite proper for a lady to pin a flower on a gentleman's coat whether she is engaged to him or not. Just now it is more proper to pin a bright little Stars and Stripes there.

E. C., Blue Ridge, Ga.—Rules of etiquette do not fit your case as rules of a law court would. Try a writ of replevin on the false one to get your letters back, but no court or no etiquette can get him back. You have lost him and knowing how false he has proved, you should not grieve, but rather rejoice that you have been delivered out of this affliction.

Unhappy, Hellier, Ky.—If you have no more feeling than to wish to leave your children and their father, even if you have discovered that you do not love him, and go away with another man, probably your husband and children would do better without you. What were such women ever made for? The man who wants you to go with him, we imagine is not much better than you are, is he?

Many Thanks, Augusta, Ky.—Etiquette does not prescribe just how far around the lady's waist the gentleman's arm should go before she dislikes it, but as this gentleman offended in that manner, you should tell him in advance how far he should go and he will not offend again, we hope. If he does, you may say anything you please to him expressive of your disapproval, or may even slap his jaws, as is sometimes done in impolite society.

Blue Eyes, Parry, Sask.—By a law of natural selection the big man will choose the little woman and the big woman will prefer the little man. It is the compensating rule which makes all things even. It sometimes happens, as in your case, that the big woman doesn't want the little man, but such cases are not natural. Still, you may marry as you please and live happily ever after, whether you are obeying the law of selection or not. Many do.

Brown Eyes, Rougemont, N. C.—The gentleman did not admire your style of manners in declining to be kissed and has no doubt sought ladies who are more to his liking. When he tells others that he still loves you, but that you are mad with him, he is merely prevaricating to defend his ungentlemanly conduct.

The Masked Bridal

which Emil Correlli had showered upon her.

"How can I help you, lady?" Giulia inquired, with a look of surprise.

"Call me Edith—I am only a poor, friendless girl, like yourself," she gently returned. "But I want to go away from this house immediately—I must get out of it unobserved; then I can catch a train that leaves Boston at three o'clock, for New York."

"Ah! you wish to run away from Emil!" exclaimed Giulia, her face lighting with eagerness.

"Yes—I would never own myself his wife for a single hour. I was planning, when you came in, to get away tonight when the house was quiet; but doubtless they would lock my door if I continued to be obstinate, and it would be a great deal better for me, every way, if I could go now," Edith explained.

"Yes, I will help you—I will do anything you wish," said Giulia, heartily.

"Then come!" exclaimed Edith, excitedly, "I want you to go down to him; he is in one of the rooms below—in the library, I think—a room under the one opposite this. He will be so astonished by your unexpected visit that he will be thrown off his guard, and you must manage to occupy his attention until you are sure I am well out of the house—which will be in less than ten minutes after you are in his presence—and then I shall have nothing more to fear from him."

"I will do it," said the Italian girl, rising, a look of resolve on her handsome but care-lined face.

"Thank you! thank you!" returned Edith, earnestly. "I am going straight to New York to friends; but of course, you will not betray my plans."

"No, indeed; but do you think your friends can help you break with Emil—do you believe that ceremony can be canceled?" breathlessly inquired Giulia.

"I hope so," Edith answered; "at all events, if I can but once put myself under the protection of my friends, I shall no longer fear him. I shall then try to have the marriage annulled. Perhaps, when he realizes how determined I am, he may even be willing to submit to it."

"Oh, do you think so?—do you think so?" cried Giulia, tremulously, and with hopeful eagerness.

"I will hope so," replied Edith, gravely, "and I will also hope that I may be able to do something to make you and this dear child happy once more. What a sweet little fellow he is!" she concluded as she leaned forward and kissed him softly on the cheek, an act which brought the quick tears to his mother's eyes.

"You must go," said Edith, advancing to the door, and softly opening it. "I have no time to lose if I am to catch my train. Remember, the room under the one opposite this—you will easily find it. Now, good by, and Heaven bless you both."

With a look of deepest gratitude and veneration, Giulia Fiorini, her child clasped in her arms, passed out of the room and moved swiftly toward the grand staircase leading to the lower part of the house; while Edith, closing and locking the door after her, stood listening until she should reach the library, where she was sure Emil Correlli sat reading.

She heard the sweep of the girl's robes upon the stairs; then, a moment later, a stifled exclamation of mingled surprise and anger fell upon her ears, after which the library door was hastily shut, and Edith began to breathe more freely.

She hastened to put on her jacket, preparatory to leaving the house. But an instant afterward her heart leaped into her throat, as she caught the sound of the hurried opening and shutting of the library door again.

Then there came swift steps over the stairs.

Edith knew that Emil Correlli was coming to ascertain if she were safe within her room; that he feared if Giulia had succeeded in gaining an entrance there, without being discovered, she might possibly have escaped in the same way.

She moved noiselessly across the room toward the dressing-case and opened a drawer, just as there came a knock on her door.

"Is that you, Mrs. Goddard?" Edith questioned, in her usual tone of voice, though her heart was beating with great, frightened throbs.

"No; it is I," responded Emil Correlli. "I wish to speak with you a moment, Edith."

"You must excuse me just now, Mr. Correlli," the girl replied, as she rattled the stopper to one of the perfumery bottles on the dressing-case; "I am dressing, and cannot see any one just at present."

"Oh!" returned the voice from without, in a modified tone, as if the man were intensely relieved by her reply. I beg your pardon; but when can I see you—how long will it take you to finish dressing?"

"Not more than fifteen or twenty minutes, perhaps," she returned.

"Ah, you are relenting!" said the man, eagerly. "You will come down by and by—you will dine with us this evening, Edith?" he concluded, in an appealing tone.

"Mr. Correlli," she said at last, in a tone which he interpreted as one of timid concession. "I—I wish to do what is right and—I think perhaps I will come down as soon as I finish dressing."

His face lighted and flushed with triumph.

He believed that she was yielding—won over by the munificent gifts with which he had crowded her room.

"Ah! thank you! thank you!" he responded, with delight. "But take your own time, dear, and make yourself just as beautiful as possible, and I will come up for you in the course of half an hour."

He flattered himself that he would be well rid of Giulia by that time; and having assured himself that Edith was safe in her room, and, as he believed, gradually submitting to his terms, he retraced his steps down-stairs, the cruel lines about his mouth hardening as he went, for he had resolved to cast off forever the girl who had become nothing but a burden and an annoyance to him.

Edith did not move until she heard him enter the library again and close the door after him.

Then, hurriedly, buttoning her jacket and pinning on her hat, she took from her trunk the package which she had made up an hour before, stole softly from her room and down the back stairs to the area hall.

The outer door was closed and bolted—the gas-man having long since finished his errand and departed—and she could hear the cook and one of the maids conversing in the kitchen just across the hall.

Evidently no one had attempted to go up-stairs since Giulia's entrance, consequently the key had not yet been missed nor the door discovered to be unlocked.

Cautiously slipping the bolt to the street door, Edith quickly passed out, closing it noiselessly after her.

Another moment she was in the street, speeding with swift, light steps across the park.

Arrived at the station, she had ten minutes to wait, after purchasing her ticket, and the uneasiness with which she watched the slowly moving hands upon the clock in the gloomy waiting-room may be imagined.

Her waiting was over at last, and, exactly on time, the train came thundering to the station.

Edith quickly boarded it, then sank weak and trembling upon the nearest empty seat, her heart beating so rapidly that she panted with every breath.

Then the train began to move, and, with a prayer of thankfulness over her escape, the excited girl leaned back against the cushion and gave herself up to rest, knowing that she could not now be overtaken before arriving in New York.

This feeling of security did not last long, however, and she was filled with dismay as she thought that Emil Correlli would doubtless discover her flight in the course of half an hour, if he had not already done so, when he would probably surmise that she would go immediately to New York and so telegraph to have her arrested upon her arrival there.

The first time the conductor came through the car she asked him for a Western Union slip, when she wrote the following message and addressed it to Royal Bryant's office on Broadway:

"Shall arrive at Grand Central Station, via. B. & A. R. R., at nine o'clock. Do not fail to meet me. Important. EDITH ALLANDALE."

When the conductor came back again, she gave this to him, with the necessary money, and asked if he would kindly forward it from Framingham for her.

He cheerfully promised to do so. Then, feeling greatly relieved, Edith settled herself contentedly for a nap, for she was very weary and heavy-eyed from the long strain upon her nerves and lack of sleep.

She did not wake for more than three hours, when she found that daylight had faded, and that the lamps had been lighted in the car.

At New Haven she obtained a light lunch from a boy who was crying his viands through the train, and when her hunger was satisfied she straightened her hat and drew on her gloves, knowing that another two hours would bring her to her destination.

Then she began to speculate upon possible and impossible things, and to grow very anxious regarding her safety upon her arrival in New York.

Perhaps Royal Bryant had not received her message.

He might have left his office before it arrived; maybe the officials at Framingham had even neglected to send it; or Mr. Bryant might have been out of town.

What could she do if, upon alighting from the train, some burly policeman should step up to her and claim her as his prisoner?

She had thus worked herself up to a very nervous and excited state by the time the lights of the great metropolis could be seen in the distance; her face grew flushed and feverish, her eyes were like two points of light, her temples throbbed, her pulses leaped, and her heart beat with great, frightened throbs.

The train had to make a short stop where one road crossed another just before entering the city, and the poor girl actually grew faint and dizzy with the fear that an officer might perhaps board the train at that point.

Almost as the thought flashed through her brain, the car door opened and a man entered, when a thrill of pain went quivering through every nerve, prickling to her very finger-tips.

A second glance showed her that it was a familiar form, and she almost cried out with joy as she recognized Royal Bryant and realized that she was—safe!

He saw her immediately and went directly to her, his gleaming eyes telling a story from his heart which instantly sent the rich color to her brow.

"Miss Allandale!" he exclaimed, in a low, eager tone, as he clasped her outstretched hand. "I am more than glad to see you once again."

"Then you received my telegram," she said.

"Yes, else I should not be here," he returned; "but I came very near missing it. I was just on the point of leaving the office when the messenger-boy brought it in. I suppose our advertisement is to be thanked for your appearance in New York thus opportunely."

"Not wholly," Edith returned. "If it had been that alone which called me here, I need not have telegraphed you. I saw it only yesterday; but my chief reason for coming hither is that I am a fugitive."

"A fugitive!" repeated her companion, in surprise. "Ah, yes, I wondered a little over that word 'important' in your message. It strikes me," he added, smiling significantly down upon her, "that you left New York in very much the same manner."

"Yes," she faltered, flushing rosily.

"From whom and what were you fleeing, Edith? Surely not from one who would have been only too glad to shield you from every ill?" said the young man.

She shot one swift glance into his face and saw that his eyes were luminous with the great love that was throbbing in his manly heart, and with an inward start of exceeding joy she drooped her lids again, but not before he had read in the look and the tell-tale flush that flooded cheeks, brow and neck, that his affection was returned.

"I will forgive you, dear, if you will be kind to me in the future," he whispered, taking courage from her sweet shyness and bashfulness. "And now tell me why you are a fugitive from Boston, for your telegram was dated from that city."

"I will," she murmured, "I will tell you all about the dreadful things that have happened to me; but not here," she added, with an anxious glance around. "Will you take me to some place where I shall be safe?" she continued, appealingly. "I have no place to go unless it is to some hotel, and I shrink from a public house."

"My child, why are you trembling so?" the young man inquired, as he saw she was shaking from head to foot. "I am very glad," he added, "that I was inspired to board the train at the crossing, and thus can give you my protection in the confusion of your arrival."

"I am glad, too; it was very thoughtful of you," said Edith, appreciatively; "but—but I am also going to need your help again in a legal way."

"You shall have it; I am ready to throw myself heart and hand between you and any trouble of whatever nature. Now about a safe place for you to stay while you are in the city. I have a married cousin who lives on West Fortieth street; we are the best of friends and she will gladly entertain you at my request, until you can make other arrangements."

"But to intrude upon an entire stranger——" began Edith, looking greatly disturbed.

"Nellie will not seem like a stranger to you, two minutes after you have been introduced to her," the young man smilingly returned. "She is the dearest, sweetest little cousin a man ever had, and she has an equal admiration for your COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Mrs. J. H. B., Ithaca, N. Y.—It is not necessary in renting to have a printed contract, or lease, as a written one is quite as binding. However, you can get printed blanks for a few cents and save considerable writing, besides they contain the important conditions that you might not think of. Make inquiries in any real estate office in your town, for any details you may think you need. The renting of your house you will find a much easier proposition than getting a good tenant who is prompt pay and will take proper care of the property.

Mrs. N. W. B., Freedom Station, Ohio.—About the only purchasers for newspapers of ancient date are collectors, or libraries wanting to complete files and your best plan to get to them is by advertising what you have in the city newspapers. You can put such an advertisement in the Cincinnati Enquirer Want Ads, at no cost to you. Ask your county editor to write the ad for you—that is, if you are a subscriber to his paper, which you ought to be.

Miss M. P., Antigo, Wis.—The words "Je vous ame," as you have them, should be "Je vous aime," and they are French, meaning "I love you." Why didn't you ask the young man why he didn't know his French better before quoting it at you?

V. A. S., Welch's P. O., Va.—Good walnut logs are as good as old wheat, or new money and if you will advertise them for sale in a city newspaper, or in The American Lumberman, Chicago, Ill., so that buyers will know what you have, you will have no trouble in disposing of them at a fair price. Other COMFORT readers having walnut logs for sale make a note of this.

Mrs. J. F. H., Oaktown, Ind.—We know of no lists of Woman's Exchanges. Nearly every town of any size has one or more, and if you will address your letter to "Woman's Exchange" in any city you want to deal with, it will be delivered if there is one there. Put your own address in corner of your envelope for return if not delivered.

Mrs. K. D. E., Biloxi, Miss.—We are glad to see that you want to make the farm productive on different lines. Write to Fulda Butterfly Shop, 812 Broadway New York City, for information about butterflies and moths and to Meyer Bros., Wholesale Druggists, St. Louis, Mo., for information about roots and herbs. There is something in raising pheasants, but you must know how to do it and have capital enough to do it in a businesslike manner. Partridges are not so easy. Belgian hares, now that the food supply is becoming a matter of interest, might be made profitable. In doing any of these things, however, you must remember that you can do nothing successfully unless you are fully informed as to conditions not only of raising things, but of marketing them. Find out what you can sell in a small way to your local people and gradually build up your business.

L. M., Shelbyville, Texas.—You can get a Concordance of the Scriptures from any bookseller. Cruden's is the standard and has been in use for many years. There are other good ones and small condensed concordances can be bought very reasonably. The complete ones are somewhat expensive. Write to American Bible Society, Bible House, New York City.

A. F. H., Garnaville, Iowa.—Nota Bene is Latin, meaning note well, or in the vernacular, Take Notice. (2) How strong a current of electricity a man can stand depends upon a number of conditions and kinds of current. Generally speaking 500 volts will kill, while 200 are dangerous and 100 doesn't amount to much. From 1,500 to 2,000 are usually administered in electrocution. (3) The cost of the European war up to now can only be guessed at, but it is far up in the billions and increasing every day. The U. S. began its share with an appropriation of seven billions.

Inquirers wanting to know about Golden Seal were informed in May COMFORT to write to Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. for particulars and we hereby repeat that advice as we are no authority on the subject.

Mrs. A. A. D., Hemp, Ga.—We cannot express an opinion on the merits of any educational institution, classical or commercial, because so much more depends upon the student than upon the teaching that a fair estimate could not be made. If you have the natural faculty for the branch you wish to study, you will succeed in getting all there is to be taught, not much matter where you go. On the other hand if you think you can be taught to do well what you have no taste or aptitude for, the best school and teachers on earth cannot make a success of you. Certainly some schools are better than others, but the right kind of a student will make up the difference. It will be safe to consider with care any unusual claims that any institution may offer to its graduates, for they do not always make good, though even in that regard the natural qualifications of the applicant may often be the cause of failure to find positions for all.

Mrs. F. C., New Cumberland, W. Va.—The Carnegie Hero Fund is located in Pittsburgh, Pa., and its Secretary and Manager is F. M. Wilmot. Write to him, but do not expect much unless you have a record of real heroism and real facts with good backing.

Miss A. D., Morefield, Nebr.—There have been twenty-eight Presidents of the United States. Andrew Jackson was the first elected as a Democrat and since his time there have been Van Buren, Tyler, Polk, Pierce, Buchanan, Cleveland and Wilson, these latter two being the only democrats since the Civil War. Cleveland was the only President married in the White House, and he and Buchanan were the only Presidents to occupy the White House as bachelors. Buchanan never married. George Washington was married in 1759 and was inaugurated in 1789. His wife was Martha Bandridge Custis, widow of John Parke Custis, and she was a Virginian as he was.

The Masked Bridal

humble servant. She will thank me for bringing you to her, and I am sure that you will be happy with her. But why do you start so?—why are you so nervous?" he concluded, as she sprang from her seat, when the train stopped, and looked wildly about her.

"I am afraid," she gasped.

"Afraid of what?" he urged, with gentle persistence.

"Of a man who has been persecuting me," she panted, the look of anxious fear still in her eyes. "I ran away from him today, and I have been afraid, all the way to New York, that he would telegraph ahead of the train, and have me stopped—that was why I sent the message to you."

"I am very glad you did," said the young man, gravely. "But, Edith, pray do not look so terrified; you are sure to attract attention with that expression on your face. Calm yourself and trust me," he concluded, as he took her hand and laid it upon his arm.

"I do—I will," she said; but her fingers closed over his with a spasmodic clasp which told him how thoroughly wrought up she was.

"Have you a trunk?" he inquired, as they moved toward the door, the train having now entered the Grand Central Station.

"No; I left everything but a few necessary articles—I can send for it later by express," she responded.

The young man assisted her from the train, then replacing her hand upon his arm, was about to signal for a carriage when they were suddenly confronted by a policeman and brought to a halt in the most summary manner.

"Sorry to trouble you, sir," said the man, speaking in a business-like tone to Mr. Bryant, "but I have orders to take this lady into custody."

Comfort's League of Cousins

the body politic. The old era of congestion on one hand and anæmia on the other will not be tolerated. It is rather a waste of time now that thrones and dynasties are crumbling, old ideas going by the board, and new nations being carved out of the welter of blood, almost overnight (upsetting all our preconceived notions of things) to say just what the future is going to hold for any of us. Personally I think there is a brighter day ahead for all mankind, and the nation that cannot make life worth while for its people, and find plenty of opportunities for its virile and ambitious youth will have to go into the melting pot and be reconstructed along entirely new lines, for the day is rapidly coming when men will no longer submit to the intolerable conditions which their rulers and bosses have forced upon them in the past.

DALLAS, TEXAS.

BELOVED UNCLE:

My husband and I are young people just starting out in life and he has a good classy "rag" just published, entitled "Flap Jacks." I am sending one to you today. I want all our COMFORT musicians to have a copy of this popular "hit." Every one sending 25c we will mail it anywhere postpaid. My husband is the composer of it. Now, Uncle Charlie I don't feel that we are asking too much of you to help us. That is what we are here for is to help one another. I know if the members of the League would hear this piece of music they would be more than pleased. Oh! Uncle, how I would like for you to hear us play it together, violin and piano. It is selling fast here in Dallas and I want to get it introduced there in your city, and everywhere I can.

So please grant us this favor and help us and I hope to hear from every one of the members sooner or later.

Hoping this will not find its way to the waste basket I am your sincere friend, LILLIAN.

What a sweet, ingenuous little note. It is truly amazing how modest are the requests that are made on those who make and publish magazines. A man who puts out a good, whole-souled, helpful publication, if luck comes his way, makes a whole army of friends. Most of these friends want to be helpful and are helpful. There are however, thousands who think that a magazine is their legitimate prey, specially designed by Providence to supply them without cost, with an easy market in which they can dispose of millions of dollars' worth of whatever goods they may happen to have on hand. Lillian wants us to give her our advertising space free of charge. Now magazines and newspapers have two things to sell. These are news, literature, etc., and advertising space. No publication can live that gives these commodities away any more than a baker could live if he gave his loaves away. There is no greater business in the world than advertising. It brings the manufacturer and the purchaser together and stimulates trade the world over. Some foolish people never read the advertising sections of magazines, and yet advertisers in many instances have spent tens of thousands of dollars to bring to their notice some laborsaving device or some article of use and adornment sadly needed in the home. Lillian says: "Now Uncle Charlie, I don't feel we are asking too much of you to help us," and reminds us that is what we are here for to help one another. I quite agree with you, Lillian, that we are here to help one another, but apparently you don't believe in the doctrine of mutual help. You want COMFORT to give you a hundred dollars' worth of advertising without charge. I don't call that helping one another, I call that getting rich at another's expense, and displaying a sordid selfishness of a very contemptible kind. Young people who start out in life with health and strength and apparently with ability and talent, should start out right, and the way to start right is to have sufficient character to pay for what you get and ask favors of no one. People who have confidence in the articles they have for sale do not ask people to advertise them free of charge. If we advertised your music free of charge, Lillian, thousands of others would come down on us to do the same little stunt for them. Legitimate advertisers, who are willing to pay for space, would be crowded out and tightwads, dead heads and schemers, who will pay for nothing if they can help it would hold sway in our columns. Then something would happen. You'd have to pay a dollar a year for your COMFORT or we'd have to go into bankruptcy. We don't care to go bankrupt, Lillian, not even to oblige such charming young ragtime specialists, as your hubby and yourself. If people would only think before they make preposterous requests how much better it would be for them and for the world at large.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a one-year subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York, grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

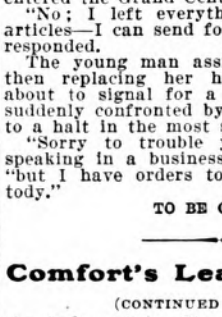
Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for June

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Written references from postmaster or physician must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Appeals unaccompanied by written references will be destroyed.



W. J. Bennett, Northville, N. Y. Invalid for fifteen years. No means of support. Give him a boost. Fannie Craig, Sanville, Va. Invalid. Would appreciate second-hand clothing, quilt pieces, and any assistance you care to send her. Priellia Tillery, Elm City, N. C. Shut-in for many years. Needy and worthy. Send her some of the sympathy that buys bread. John Owens, Golly Springs, Ga. Forty-six years of age. Chronic invalid. No means of support. Send him some help. Mrs. Anna Kindred, Bicknell, Ind. Widow. Aged, sick and poor. Send her some cheer. Mrs. Martha J. Graham, Shuff, Va. Widow. Has lung trouble. Very poor and needy. Give her a helping hand. Mary Fuller, Hopkinsville, Ky. Paralyzed from the waist down for twelve years. Poor, lonely and helpless. Do something for her. Lottie H. Cobler, Price, N. C. Invalid. Well recommended. Send her some of the sympathy that buys bread.

Be good and you'll be happy. The only way to be good is to do good. Faith without works is dead. Prayers, tracts and sympathy are all right, but it takes money to buy bread. Christianity that is not practical cuts no ice in heaven or earth. Now I've told you what to do. Open your pocketbooks as well as your hearts if you want a blessing.

Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

How You Can Get This Story In Book Form

If you do not care to wait for the monthly installments of this serial as they appear in COMFORT we will be glad to make you a present of the complete story in book form. You will enjoy reading this thrilling story of mingled romance and tragedy for it is one of the very best Mrs. Georgie Sheldon has written. The heroine is a refined and beautiful character that will challenge your wonder and admiration and stir the heart's strongest emotions. The story is full of action which moves rapidly through a succession of startling events to the final chapter. The "Masked Bridal" will run as a serial in COMFORT through the fall, winter and spring months, but you need not wait in order to get the complete story. Send us only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents, or your own subscription, renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 5 cents additional (30 cents in all) and we will send you a copy of the book free and postpaid.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Uncle Charlie's Home Fund

UNCLE CHARLIE reports $223.00, donations and subscriptions from all sources, contributed to his Home Fund by 340 persons during the month of April. This brings the total of the fund on May first up to $1,703.00 contributed by 2,515 of his friends who have thus given substantial tokens of their love and appreciation of him.

Every little counts and he is duly grateful to every contributor, however small the contribution, and above all he is pleased because each gift is a manifestation of good will. The only trouble is that there ought to be many times more of them. What a paltry few. Only 2,515 contributors out of the tens of thousands who profess their admiration of him! If you sincerely wish to send him a pledge of your affection, don't hold back merely because you are constrained by circumstances to make it very small.

Again let me remind you how you can help:

1. By cash donations.

2. By purchasing Uncle Charlie's books (see advertisement.)

3. Those who cannot spare the money for a cash donation or for purchase of his books can contribute by getting subscriptions to COMFORT in aid of the "Uncle Charlie Benefit Fund" and instead of taking the club premium or cash commission themselves direct that it be credited to the fund. In such cases I will pay over to Uncle Charlie one half of the subscription price of all subscriptions sent for this purpose. The regular cash commission on COMFORT subscriptions is 40 per cent, but for Uncle Charlie's Benefit Fund I will allow 50 per cent. Another way to help him and benefit yourself is to get up a subscription club and take one of his books as your premium.

In one or other of these ways every COMFORT reader who wishes to do so can help swell the fund for Uncle Charlie which has my hearty approval and will have my assistance.

Send all contributions to Charles Noel Douglas, care COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

If You Are A Woman Who Loves Crochet And Tatting Here Is A Set Of Books You Will Be Delighted To Own!

ANY ONE of these books alone is a veritable treasure house of the newest, most beautiful designs. The seven books combined form a complete library in which you will find any pattern in crocheting and tatting you could possibly ask for. You will fairly revel in the many handsome designs shown. There are edgings, beadings, insertions and laces for every conceivable use. The illustrations are actual photographs of the finished work and show every thread so plainly that they are almost as good to work from as the directions themselves. The directions are adapted for either beginner or expert. They tell stitch by stitch how each pattern is worked, also the quantity and size of material required and the correct sizes of hooks to be used. Following is a description of each book They are 8 by 10 1-2 inches in size with the exception of Volume I which is 9 1-4 by 12 inches. Please order by numbers.

Volume 1 Crocheted yokes for combinations, envelopes, nightgowns, corset covers, etc.—fifteen all different, exquisite designs.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

NOW comes the rosy month of June when man and maiden love to spoon and wander 'neath the silver moon and all that sort of thing that we never outgrow and which comes around regularly every time June does. Lots of people say it's silly and sensible persons don't do anything of the sort, and maybe they don't, but just the same, my dears, the world wouldn't be worth living in if the rosy month of June weren't rosy and didn't rhyme with moon and spoon. So there, and let us all thank the Lord for June, no matter how sensible we are or are not. Now, having got the Juney-spoony-meony out of my system, I'll go to work.

The first letter on the pile before me is from Hazelnut of Chapel Hill, Tenn., and she is in doubt about accepting the attentions of a grass widower who has not yet received his divorce papers. I'm glad she is in doubt and I hope she will doubt on the safe side until the man has a legal right to seek another wife. He hasn't now, and the fact that he is so anxious to get another is strong evidence against him. Maybe Hazelnut may like that kind, but I do not. She may marry him when he is free, but I think she will be sorry for it.

Lorayne, Lorain, Ohio.—Well, well, does a Buckeye girl have to ask me if she should marry a man who is more or less of a drunkard, a liar and a do-nothing? Don't be afraid if you refuse him, that he will injure some one you love, or harm anybody. He isn't that kind. Turn him down and keep him turned down and don't dream of being a movie actress. The[re] nearly as hopeless as marrying the man you mention.

Alone, Ripley, Tenn.—Of course you mustn't marry the soldier you write to, but know nothing of. Maybe he has a wife and children. (2) You have no right to insist upon the exclusive attention of any young man unless you are engaged to him. Be sensible about a young man and you will have more attention and better.

Billy, Evant, Texas.—A girl can be a chronic flirt and not be a bad girl, as that term is generally understood, but she cannot be and be an honorable girl. You admit being engaged to four young men at once, all of them thinking you are honest and honorable, but you could not have become engaged without lying to at least three of them and you have acted dishonorably with all four. It is not for me to say how you will redeem yourself, but all the engagements should be broken to begin with and each man should know the reason. That would be an honorable and honest beginning. When you say you are naturally a flirt, I believe you, just as I would believe a burglar who said he was naturally a thief. Science is devising some means to correct such defectives.

Sallie, Paducah, Ky.—Why don't you be honest with the jealous suitor and tell him frankly you don't like him and don't want him to annoy you with his attentions? Are you so afraid that you will lose him you can't be honest with yourself and with him?

Two Girls, Park City, Utah.—As your parents object to your receiving attention from young men because of your youth, suppose you wait until you are of age and can pick and choose for yourselves. Time is a terror to throbbing hearts. Try it for a year or two.

Joy C., Peoria, Ill.—Your parents are too good to you. Instead of my giving you advice how to act with your beau, I should like to give them advice how they should act with him.

Perplexed, Pleasant Valley, Ky.—The fact of your being three years older than he is does not mean anything at all, but the fact that a young chap of twenty-one likes his "toddy" may mean a very great deal before he is forty. However, as he is so good to his sisters maybe he will be good to you; I'm dreadfully afraid though of liquor in the family.

Brown Eyes, Stepstone, Ky.—I don't think it is a question whether or not you should drop him, as he seems to have dropped you. Still, he has no right to act ugly because you were not at home to receive him at four o'clock when he had an engagement to call for you at one o'clock. Anyway, don't take him back till he apologizes.

Three Girls, Stahlstown, Pa.—All three of you writing about beaus and all three of you can't write without incorrect spelling and grammar. One of you even calls a chaperon a "chapermoon!" Oh, my, oh me, and you want to know about beaus instead of books! ! !

Cowgirl, Animas, N. M.—Well, my dear, being as how he is an old friend and going away to be gone several years, I think maybe I can excuse you for kissing him good by, but don't let it happen again. And don't you say you have higher ambitions than marriage. There is no higher ambition for a woman than marriage if she marries as she should marry. Marriage, just to be marrying, is no ambition whatever.

Lonesome, Prairie View, Kans.—If you really loved him you would know it and wouldn't have to ask me. As you do not love him as you should, for goodness sake, don't marry him, or you never will love him. Break the engagement. It may hurt him, but not nearly as much as to marry him and have him learn he had a wife who didn't love him.

Alca, Greeley, Colo.—By all means tell the young man you did not write the letter to which your name was signed. If you really like him, treat him nicely and he may take you out riding again and you may be real sweethearts yet, but don't kiss and make up. Kissing is not necessary to friendship.

Lelawa, Carrizozo, N. M.—Don't be afraid you will have to marry the man if you do not want to. This is a free country yet, and nobody can compel you to be married against your will.

June Bug, Towas City, Mich.—My dear, why should you want to win back a young man who thought so little of you that he let a married woman win him away from you? I wouldn't tell you how to win him back, if I knew forty ways of doing it. Let him go and be glad to get rid of him.

Ruby, Daisy, Ga.—Beware of the widower who begins his attentions by intimating that he does not want any others around. That sort of a man is a mean, jealous pig that is a nagger always and hard to get along with. Still, if you like that kind, suit yourself. Until you become engaged you are at liberty to have just as many beaus as you can attract to you. Don't be a slave to anybody until you have to. (2) When he knew where you were he should have come there for you, instead of waiting at your house for you.

There, my dears, your questions are all answered, except some that were too silly and others not for me which you will find in other departments. I have felt so good that summer is here that I have not scolded much and I hope you feel just as rose colored in your tempers as I do. Now run along and be summer girls, but remember that the summer girl must be the right kind of a girl all the year around.

By, by,
COUSIN MARION.

Darling Sue

ward, most of it. That's what started me. When I found every man's hand raised against me, I had to steal to live. But there has been no more killin', ma'am. True, I have notched a few men's ears, for pure devilment—to sort o' scare 'em and put my trade-mark on 'em, so to speak."

He paused to stir the dying fire. "I guess nobody in this section would know me now," he went on; "but the reward still stands, all right."

The woman found her bad man an agreeable companion. He guessed her wants beforehand, and did everything that was to be done for her comfort on the little journey. Each evening as they sat about a little fire on the desert's sand he played the battered old guitar for the boy's pleasure. But he refrained from singing "Darling Sue." He and the boy became inseparable. McKenzie was father and brother and playmate to the child.

* * * * * * * * * * * *

It was the last night of their journey, and they had just finished supper. Mrs. Jefferson sat in a canvas chair, and her boy stood leaning against her knee. Directly across the bright coals John McKenzie sat on a box, looking thoughtfully into the fire. The woman watched the flickering light play on his face, and thought him a handsome man. And, she told herself, he was about twenty-seven, her own age. She knew he was young; he seemed always so proud of that little, fair mustache * * * She wished, almost, that the end of their journey was not quite so close.

"Play some more for me, Kenzie!" the boy requested, smiling to the man across the fire.

McKenzie took up the guitar and struck a few chords, but they were rather lifeless. A new thing had come into John McKenzie's life, a thing that was strange because it had come after so many wild and lonely years. After a moment of trying, he put the old instrument down on the sand.

"Little boy will have to 'scuse Kenzie this time," he muttered. "Kenzie just can't—play, somehow."

"Tomorrow—will you play tomorrow?" wistfully.

Tomorrow! Tomorrow the doors of a jail would close upon him. That fact broke into the woman's mind with a new force. It was harder than she had thought it—to deliver her boy's Kenzie to the authorities. She raised her eyes to those of the outlaw; they were gazing squarely at her, and she noted that there was a new light in them. She saw him flush in the glimmering fireglow; then he slowly bent his head.

The boy broke the silence: "Couldn't you play for mother now?"

McKenzie smiled, and there was much tenderness in it. "Maybe she doesn't care to hear my bum playin'," he said; and there was much tenderness in his voice, too.

The Widow Jefferson suddenly spoke: "McKenzie, I don't think I can play the Judas after all."

"What's that, ma'am?" and he looked up.

"I say I don't think I can sell you."

"'Sell me!'" McKenzie laughed a laugh that didn't deceive even the child. "Why, it ain't like you was sellin' me, ma'am. Because I can very easy break jail, you know——"

Mrs. Jefferson had gone to her feet. "Hush, McKenzie!" she interrupted. "You can't break jail, of course. You've just been telling me that, McKenzie, I will never do it—I won't turn you up! That's final. I'd rather go back to the dust and starvation of the Halfway House!"

"But the boy!"

She raised her hand. "It's settled, McKenzie." And he knew it was.

He stood up, then went around the fire and stopped within a yard of her.

"I've got another proposition to offer," he said. "We can sell the horses for enough money to land us in St. Louis—let me go along and take care of you and the boy—I mean marry me, and let me work for you! Bowers wouldn't care if he could know. I need you, Sue—I need you even more than you need me. I'll surrender the wild life. Maybe you'd come to like me in time, Sue. Won't you?"

His sunburned face mirrored a greatness in his soul, and his nether lip trembled as he tried to smile.

"The past is dead," he went on; "the past is always dust; there is only the future, and let's live it together. Honest, I'll give up the wild life. See, I surrender, Sue——"

He took his revolver-laden belt from about his hips and placed it in her hands. Then, with his eyes shining with the first tears he could remember, he sang, low and throbbingly, the last line of the song the woman loved——

"'I takes and lays 'em where my heart lies too!'"

The heavy pistols dropped to the desert sand, and Sue Jefferson's arms went around John McKenzie's neck. She felt that dead Bowers wouldn't care if he could know.

into noble and divine blessings; and there are no blessings which the mind may not convert into evils.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around The Home

To make a broom last longer and sweep well, dip it in a pail of boiling suds once a week.

Wash your stove, then put a few drops of linseed oil on a woolen cloth and rub the stove well and it is not necessary to blacken it.

Take two parts of sifted coal ashes and sand, mixed well together, to one part of flour; mix with water. This makes an excellent mortar for patching cracks in the plaster.

To kill rose bugs, make a suds of Ivory soap and water, a cake of soap to a tub of water, and apply to bushes and ground.
MARTHA BALES, Willoughby, Oregon.

To remove skunk odor, make a strong smudge of oat hay and place garments near it and the odor will soon disappear.
MRS. I. E. S., Great Falls, Mont.

Remedies

Sulphur and vaseline mixed makes a fine healing salve.

A solution of salt and water is good for falling hair. Use twice a week.
MRS. ELMER HARLOW, Woodward, Iowa.

Equal parts of aqua ammonia and glycerine rubbed on the hands after washing is an excellent remedy for sunburn, poison ivy and chapped hands. If there are any open places it will find them and sting for a second but it does a lot of good.
E. ELLIOTT, California.

FOR BETTER HEALTH.—Nothing is better to take on rising than a cup of hot water. One hot drink on an empty stomach clears the system for the day and for many persons a tablespoon of lemon juice increases the efficacy. Taken on going to bed without the lemon juice it will help to induce sleep. Both night and morning it has the effect of helping to clear the complexion.

RHEUMATISM.—Take the roots of Rose Noble (an herb to be found in many localities, or could be secured from a druggist) and pound them up and put in a large bottle and cover with whiskey. Let stand a few hours and then take in doses as ordinary medicine. Some add burdock seed to the preparation, as it is beneficial. If one does not like to use the whiskey the roots may be eaten, but they are very bitter. This has helped many of my friends and I hope will help others.
MRS. JOHN LATIMER, Edingburg, Pa.

Requests

Cure for hives.

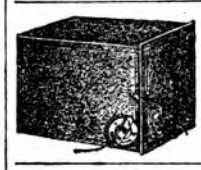
How to rid a yard of red ants.

How to make Chinese chop suey.

Poem, "The Housekeeper's Lament."

Song containing words, "Does a Railroad Lead to Heaven?"

Mrs. Bertha Schulz, Allentown, 127 So. 4th St., Pa., would like to correspond with any of the sisters who paint in oils or water colors.



Miss Agnes Travis, Platte, S. Dak. would like poems, "The Log Cabin on the Mississippi Shore," and "Sweet Days of Childhood." Will return favor.

Will someone tell me how to dye a wool suit (partly mixed) a dark blue, without boiling. It is blue now. MRS. FRANK BURKE, Dade City, R. R. 74 A, Fla.

5 Wheel Chairs in May

415 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The five May wheel chairs go to the following shut-ins. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

Ethel May Hall, Rougemont, N. C., 200; Mrs. Mollie McNeill, Duke, N. C., 136; Johnnie May Heatherly, Bremen, Ala., 103; Thomas R. Hancock, Winterpack, Va., 101; Mrs. Lucinda Sission, Forest Hill, La., 99

Ethel May Hall, age 17, describes herself in a beautifully written letter as having always been an invalid and unable to walk a step. Her friends sent the entire 200 subscriptions for her chair in three weeks' time.

Mrs. Mollie McNeill, age 41, has been crippled by rheumatism nearly six years. Her legs are drawn up and useless. Her arms are affected so that she can barely use her right hand to feed herself.

Johnnie May Heatherly, age 16, is confined to her bed by tuberculosis of the bone which developed from white swelling of the knee. It is five years since she took her last step. She is entirely helpless.

Thomas R. Hancock, age 13, has been partially paralyzed all his life so that he can not walk and can use only one hand.

Mrs. Lucinda Sission, age 71, paralyzed in her left side since February, 1916, is almost helpless. Even her tongue is affected so that she can hardly talk.

These are all hard cases but there are many more equally distressing that are suffering for wheel chairs and need your help. Don't fail them. We want to do better yet next month.

We have an interesting roll of honor. Why not get your name there next month?

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 25 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours. Any shut-in who has friends to help him get subscriptions can obtain a wheel chair free. Write me for information.

Thinks Her COMFORT Wheel Chair Simply Grand

GRADY, NEW MEXICO.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I have received my chair and I think it is simply grand. I thank you very much, also the friends who were so kind in helping me get the subscriptions. I will do all I can to help other needy shut-ins get chairs. May the Lord richly bless you in your good work. Yours sincerely, MRS. T. B. CHRISTIAN.

Little Boy Expresses His Appreciation of His COMFORT Wheel Chair

BOONE MILL, VA.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I want you to know how much I enjoy and appreciate my wheel chair. Mother says she will have to tie me to keep me from killing myself, for I just go all over the house in it. I thank you and all who kindly helped me to get it. May you have big success with your mercy work. I remain as ever, your little friend, ROLAND EUGENE CHEWNIN.

Little Crippled Girl Takes Great Delight in Her COMFORT Wheel Chair

OREGON CITY, OREGON.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

Words cannot express our sincere gratitude for the lovely wheel chair you sent our little daughter Nada. She has been out in it only twice, so far, on account of the weather having been so terribly bad, but she can use the chair in the house and takes great delight in it. With its help I shall keep her out of doors most of the time when the weather is suitable. We expect to have a picture taken of her sitting in her wheel chair and will send you one for COMFORT. I am sending you a few more subscriptions. Don't think that, after you have treated me so fine, I would lose interest in getting wheel-chair subscriptions. Thanking you and the dear, kind friends who assisted us in getting Nada's chair, I am your well-wisher,

MRS. S. A. STRONG.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

K. W., Lundgren, Minn.—We cannot give recommendations to any patent medicines. Some are good and some are not. Some are really medicines and some are fakes.

Mrs. S. A. H., Calhoun, Ala.—An electric, or other, vibrator may be useful and beneficial in some cases to start the circulation. Consult your physician and see if he will recommend it in your case.

R. S., Silay, Oc. Neg., P. I.—Your trembling, heart palpitation, perspiration and tears when you are called on in class, when you are addressed unexpectedly, or among strangers and your inability to remain composed when talking to the young ladies is due to self-consciousness, which is another name for nervousness. Something is wrong with your nervous system, either acquired or natural, and you must put yourself under the direction of a nerve specialist, or a physician who is skilled in nervous diseases and let him try to restore you to normal condition. You are too young to neglect yourself now and continue under this nervous strain until it affects your mind, as it is quite sure to do eventually. It is a long way from Maine to the Philippines, but we know you have good doctors there and you must get one who not only understands your case, but who has sympathy for you as well and will give you just the treatment necessary. Let us hear from you again next year.

C. P., Mitchell, Ga.—All your ailments are of the surgical kind and can only be treated by a physician who can make personal examinations of their condition. Any advice that we could give would be entirely guesswork, which is really worse than no advice at all. We hope that all COMFORT patients will understand that surgical cases, that is broken bones, wounds, old sores and others of various kinds can only be treated by a physician who can make personal examination.

N. M., Mar, W. Va.—The standard remedy for warts of the ordinary kind is luna caustic which you can buy at any drug-store. It is applied to the warts and will destroy them. Be careful in applying it not to get it on the surrounding skin as it will burn it and make an ugly sore. Unless the warts are very large, numerous and on the inside of the hands, the caustic will not prevent your brother working.

B. H. V., Monticello, Ark.—Kidney troubles are too serious to be treated by mail. There is always danger of Bright's disease and when this has once become fixed, there is very little hope for a patient. The proper course is to have examinations promptly made and treatment prescribed in time to prevent. You have no doubt often heard that prevention is better than cure. It is not only true, but it is still better than no cure at all, because of neglect when there was time.

A. R. L., Sullivan, Ill.—Fasting is an excellent relief for indigestion, if it is done properly. As your indigestion is from over-eating, that is, giving your digestive organs more work to do than they are equal to, what better remedy could be applied than rest? Eat half as much as you are now eating, chew every mouthful to a pulp before swallowing, and eat nothing which does not agree with you perfectly, no matter how much you may like it. If you must drink coffee, drink only one cup a day with or without sugar, as you like.

W. H. H., Potlatch, Ida.—The baby has inherited a predisposition to nervousness and temper from his mother, and if he is handled carefully much of that may be overcome, but not by physical means. Don't punish him physically, but, in every way you can, impress upon his mind the danger of giving way to his temper and the real sin there is in such weakness. Teach him self-control as a duty to himself and those he cares most for and we think by the time he is old enough to understand it all, he will be so influenced by it that he will be a very fair average human being. Possibly his eyes are still a little crossed, and you are used to it and don't notice it. There is some weakness there, and this you should have a competent physician look after and correct if necessary, though many children have this defect and speedily outgrow it. Some of his nervousness may be due to some defect of vision as often happens. We are glad to see that you are not like a good many of our COMFORT mothers who foolishly think they can raise children properly without advice from anybody, and without knowing the first principles of child rearing.

Anxious, Harrisburg, Ark.—Fainting spells, so called, are not infrequent, and often are not especially serious, but oftener they are symptoms of the most dangerous diseases. Their cause cannot be guessed at and you must consult a physician who can thoroughly examine you and decide intelligently what is the cause and treat it properly. One such spell may happen and none ever come again, but when there have been two, it is time to make immediate and serious inquiry.

Mrs. J. L., Mt. Auburn, Iowa.—Neuralgia of the heart has the sharp pains you describe and it is a disease that may be relieved if not cured, but it is very unreliable and may result fatally on very short notice. You must have a physician who can examine you and know all the conditions so that there shall be no guesswork. Angina pectoris, which is practically the same thing, is one of the most painful diseases known and while it is not always suddenly fatal, it often is, though the patient may have attacks of it for a long time. Sometimes they are frequent, sometimes at long intervals, and they are always dangerous and very painful.

Rita, Marion, Ind.—There isn't any cure for blushing that we know of. It may be relieved to a great extent if the sufferer can cultivate a degree of non-selfconsciousness, so to speak, which prevents her ever thinking about herself at all, but not many can do that. It is due to nervousness which is natural and nature is generally incurable. Persistent practise in forgetting your own existence will help more than any other prescription we know of.

Mrs. C. S., Coeur d'Alene, Ida.—Your eyes hurt you continually and you cannot see well, but you cannot have a physician examine them and tell you what should be done for relief, because you cannot afford it! Well, do you think there is any economy which would justify the loss of your sight? Couldn't you afford to make a good many sacrifices rather than sacrifice your sight? Looking towards you from Maine to Idaho we cannot very well detect whether you are cross-eyed or not. We can tell, though, that you are totally blind, or you would see the absolute necessity of having a physician examine your eyes and prescribe for you.

H. F. S., Baudette, Minn.—A scar caused by a wound deep enough cannot be wholly removed, though some skin specialists can improve its appearance if it is very disfiguring. Such treatment is usually expensive and not always satisfactory. There is no fixed rule for removing disfiguring scars known to medicine, or surgery, and only an examining physician can give an opinion as to what may be done with yours.

M. B. C., Nathalie, Va.—There is no cure for chills as long as you live in an ague neighborhood, or climate, unless you can prevent being bitten by mosquitoes. Move away from where you now are to some part of your state where there is no ague and you will not have any more trouble with the shakes. It is now known that the ague germ is put into the blood by the mosquito bite. Your stomach trouble and nervousness come largely from the drugs you are taking for the chills and will continue as long as the chills are with you, and they will be with you as long as you live where they prevail, unless you can exterminate or avoid the mosquitoes.

L. T. Washington, D. C.—As the gas is due to fermentation, which means poor digestion and you have adopted a diet which may in time improve conditions, we would suggest that you take during the day several drinks of hot water with a pinch of bicarbonate of soda in it. This will neutralize the acid and give temporary relief. What you need more than anything else now, is exercise in the open air as a corrective of your eight hours a day in an office. You should walk from three to five miles a day, good sharp walking, and there are plenty of fine walks about your town. It will do you more good than medicine.

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

M. C., Indiana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the payment of a note can be enforced against any property owned by one or both of two joint makers of the note, except, of course, such small allowances as are allowed by law as exemptions.

J. P., Mississippi.—Under the laws of South Carolina we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will, and leaving a husband and a brother as her only heirs at law and next of kin, her estate after payment of debts and expenses, would go in equal shares to such husband and brother.

P. L. B., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will and leaving a surviving husband and one child as her only heirs at law and next of kin, after payment of debts and expenses, the husband would receive one third of the personal property absolutely and one third of the real estate for life, the balance going to her child.

Mrs. E. L., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we do not think an illegitimate child has any inheritance rights in the father's estate, unless some provision is made by will or unless they have been legitimatized.

L. M. W., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a widow and one child as his only heirs at law and next of kin, his estate after payment of debts and expenses would go one third of the personal property absolutely, and one third of the real estate for life to the widow and the remainder to the child.

P. B., Oregon.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the parents are legally entitled to the custody and control of their minor children.

F. B., Minnesota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all contracts for the conveyance of real estate must be in writing to make them enforceable.

Mrs. N. C. S., Arkansas.—We think that if your husband died leaving no will and if he left property it will be necessary to have an administrator appointed by the court to legally settle his estate; we think you would have a preference for their appointment.

B. C. G., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of Kansas we are of the opinion that children, during the lifetime of the parents, have no interest in such parents' real estate and the same can be sold by the parent without the consent of the children; we think children can be disinherited by will, but in the absence of a will we think upon the death of a married man his homestead goes one half in value to the widow and one half in equal shares to the children, but that in order to constitute a homestead the land must be occupied by the family, and if the deceased leaves a widow and children the property cannot be divided until the youngest child reaches twenty-one years of age, unless the widow remarries; we think the widow receives one half of the balance of the real estate, not released by her, unless the same is necessary to pay debts, and that the personal property, not necessary to pay debts is treated in the same manner as the homestead property, the balance of the estate going to the children equally.

T. T., Illinois.—Upon your statements we are of the following opinion; that it would be necessary to go in to the matter of the court proceeding under which the property you mention was sold to form an opinion as to whether you now have any chance of recovering any of this property. We think that if it was sold through a properly conducted court proceeding, your chances of recovering the property now, would be very slight, but that if on the other hand, there was some fraud committed in connection with this court proceeding you might upset same. We think that if your father left no will and left property to which you were entitled during your minority, the same should have been administered by a guardian and that in case such guardian has not accounted to you for your share of this property, you should be able to compel an accounting, unless your rights to same have been barred by the statute of limitations owing to your neglect to prosecute same within proper time after becoming of age. You furnish me with no information as to how much time has elapsed since your father's death nor as to how long it has been since you became of age.

Mrs. C. S., Martinsville, Ill.—We do not think that a minor can be held for contracts made by him during minority unless the same are validated when he becomes of age. We do not think a deed to real estate executed by a minor conveys good title to such real estate. We think that in order to settle a minor's interest in an estate and receive good deeds or receipts for same, it would be necessary to transact business through such minor's guardian or through or under a court judgment or decree in some proceeding brought for that purpose.

Mrs. J. K., Little Falls, Minn.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion, that unless your neighbor has some easement or right of way across your property, you have a legal right to stop him from driving across the same. We think, however, that he might have procured such easement or right of way, either through some deed or agreement in connection with same or through a possessory right of the use of same for a long period of years, upon your consent or the consent of the former owners of the property.

J. McN., Hillsboro, Ohio.—We are of the opinion that under the Act of September 8, 1916, estates of less than $50,000 are exempt where decedent was a resident of the United States, from the Federal inheritance tax; and that in your state the said laws exempt parents, husband and wife, lineal descendants or an adopted child and to others five per cent on any amount above an exemption of $500. We think a full digest of the inheritance laws would be too exhaustive a subject for us to undertake in a communication of this kind.

J. L. Z., Falls City, Nebr.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that the children of the marriage do not come in to any right to property belonging to the husband upon the death of their mother before the death of the father. We think, however, that in the absence of a will, such children would come in to their share of their father's estate upon his death, but that they would have no rights to his property during his lifetime even after their mother dies. Of course, if these children were the children of the wife by a former marriage they would have no interest in the estate of her second husband unless provided for by will, in a case where their mother pre-deceased such second husband. We think that in case the husband of the woman you mention was the father of the children you mention, he would have a legal right to disinherit such children by will, but that in case he leaves no will they would receive their share, the amount of which would depend upon whether or not he re-married. In case he dies leaving no will and leaving no widow, we think his children would be entitled to share his property in equal shares, descendants of any deceased child taking the parent's share.

A. M. O., Santa Fe, Kansas.—We think that a marriage by a man or woman having a husband or wife living from whom they are not divorced is a bigamist and an illegal marriage and would make the person so marrying subject to punishment for such act.

FRECKLES

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as the prescription othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.—Advt.

The Origin of Savings Banks

When it is considered that in some states such as Massachusetts, one out of every two and a half people have savings bank accounts, and in New York with its great population, one out of three, the intimacy with which the savings bank touches the individual will become manifest. In fact no other institution except the home, the church, or the school comes into such close contact with humanity as does the savings bank. And because it touches the lives of so many people so vitally, the whole body politic is interested in the savings bank and what it does.

Financially speaking no other institution has such a marked effect for good to the individual and the community, as does the bank that takes your money. Every time you cross a well paved street, take a walk in the park, send your children to school, turn in an alarm of fire, draw some water, look with pride upon your public buildings, enter a well kept home, you pay tribute to the institution that made these things possible, and that institution is the savings bank.

While the bank of discount is an indispensable part of business life, and we could not do business without it, the number of patrons of the banks of discount is insignificant in comparison with the depositors of the savings banks of the country, now numbering over ten million.

It is well to know something about this feature of banking, for a savings bank is more than "a place to put money"—it is a great co-operative investment institution. Like a great many other institutions that have made for human good, the savings bank is a development, and the origin of the idea is in doubt. Daniel Defoe of "Robinson Crusoe" fame is mentioned as the original savings bank man, who conceived a scheme for the receipt of deposits on the part of the Government Nothing came of it. Priscilla Wakefield and Joseph Smith in England also had schemes for the receipt of deposits on the part of the well to do, of small savings and the repaying of the same at Christmas time with a bounty, contributed by the wealthy managers; but these endeavors worked on the theory that the poor should be encouraged to save for the sake of the reward offered, and were supported by the donations of the rich, which is far from the savings bank idea. The first man to grasp the fact that the earning power of the money left in the care of the managers should support the institution, was the Rev. Henry Duncan, a Scotch preacher, who, in the village of Ruthwell, Scotland, opened his savings bank—the first true savings bank, in 1810, along the lines still in vogue today. This was the first savings bank that had in it the essential elements of success. Impressed with the improvidence of the people of his parish he resolved to found an institution to receive their small savings, invest them for the benefit of the depositor and after paying the expenses of management, return the balance to the depositors as interest. This plan proved so sensible and so helpful that savings banks sprang up all over England and Scotland, and shortly the idea crossed the Atlantic, resulting in the savings bank movement in this country, which closely followed the lines laid down by Duncan's bank.

Comfort's Comicalities

"Jest for Fun"

Diplomat

"Sir," said the angry woman, "I understand you said I had a face that would stop a street-car in the middle of the block."

"Yes, that's what I said," calmly answered the mere man. "It takes an unusually handsome face to induce a motor-man to make a stop like that."—Topeka Journal.

He Didn't Bite

"Don't you ever long for a home of your own? asked the coy young thing. "I should think you'd get awfully tired of boarding-house cooking."

"I do," replied the wary bachelor, "but, you see, a fellow can change his boarding house without taking a trip to Reno."—Louisville Herald.

According to His Folly

The new minister was dining with an old lady. She had fried chicken for dinner, and he was very fond of chicken gizzard. Just for fun he told her he ate them to make him handsome. She adjusted her glasses and, looking him over, said, "Well, you ain't been eating them long, have you?"—Christian Herald.

No Fussy Housekeeper

"Ah see yo' is housecleanin'," said Mrs. Snow White.

"Yes," replied Mrs. Marsh Green, "dey is nothin' lak' movin' things 'round once in a while. Why, I des come across a pair ob slippers under de bed dat Ah hadn't seen foh five years."—Dallas News.

Durable

The admiration which Bob felt for his Aunt Margaret included all her attributes.

"I don't care much for plain teeth like mine, Aunt Margaret," said Bob, one day, after a long silence, during which he had watched her in laughing conversation with his mother. "I wish I had some copper-toed ones like yours."—Youth's Companion.

He Was It

Among the participants in court that morning were two women who claimed the same man as a husband.

"Who's that very skinny fellow over there?" questioned one of the visitors.

"He's the bone of contention," chuckled the court attendant.—Louisville Courier-Journal.

A Weighty Reason

Bluffer—"Why don't you assert yourself in your own house? Is there any weighty reason?"

Meekly—"Well, no; she only weighs 110 pounds."—Exchange.

Worse Yet

A German spy caught red-handed was on his way to be shot.

"I think you English are brutes," he growled, "to march me through this rain and slush."

"Well," said the "Tommy" who was escorting him, "what about me? I have to go back in it."—Tid-Bits.

Efficiency

Mr. Goodnuff—"My boy, when I was your age I didn't smoke in the way you do!"

Boy—"I should guess not. Why, there ain't a kid in the ally that kin inhale like me!"

Matrimonial Ideas

"Why do you object to my marrying your daughter?"

"Because you can't support her in the style to which she has been accustomed all her life."

"How do you know I can't? I can start her on bread and milk, same as you did."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Set Him to Thinking

De Sappie—"Do you know, Miss Mary, I'm afraid I'm engaged to the wrong girl."

She—"What leads you to think so?"

De Sappie—"She is going to marry another fellow."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"Nor Custom Stale"

Mother—"You were a long time in the conservatory with Mr. Willing last night, my child. What was going on?"

Daughter—"Did you ever sit in the conservatory with father before you married him?"

Mother—"I suppose I did."

Daughter—"Well, mother, it's the same old world."—Tit-Bits.

The Feminine Vote

"I suppose you are campaigning among the plain people?"

"No. I want the beauty vote and I want yours, madam."

She promised it.—Kansas City Journal.

Cause for Wrath

Jones (to his grocer)—"You seem angry, Mr. Brown."

Brown—"I am. The inspector of weights and measures has just been in."

Jones—"Ha, ha! He caught you giving fifteen ounces to the pound, did he?"

Brown—"Worse than that. He said I'd been giving seventeen."—Tid-Bits.

Must be a Woman

Brinker—"Yes, your wife's clothes have cost me a good bit of money."

Tinker—"My wife's clothes! What do you mean?"

Brinker—"Why, every time your wife gets a new gown, my wife must have one just as expensive!"—Judge.

Hard Going

"I heard you have gone into business old fellow."

"Yep, the restaurant business."

"And how is the restaurant business, as you find it?"

"Quite a grind. I eat in my own place as an advertisement, but it is beginning to tell on me."

Careless

"What brought you here, my poor man?" asked the prison visitor.

"Just plain absent-mindedness," replied the prisoner.

"Why, how could that be?"

"I forgot to scratch the monogram off a watch before I pawned it."—Buffalo News.

Movies Discourage Saloons

A member of the Motion Pictute Board of Review recently said that due credit should be given to moving picture theaters for diminishing the number of saloons throughout the country. More than five hundred were crowded out of New York City last year, due to moving picture theaters; while four hundred went out of business in Brooklyn. The percentage of saloons eliminated in smaller manufacturing towns is even greater than in New York.

Two-Millionth Alien

Kazimierz Wiadek Gawezwmski, a Russian of Trenton, N. J., is the two millionth alien naturalized in the United States since the establishment of the Bureau of Naturalization Dec. 27, 1916. Gawezwmski's final application papers, numbered 2,000,000, were approved and passed and placed on file.

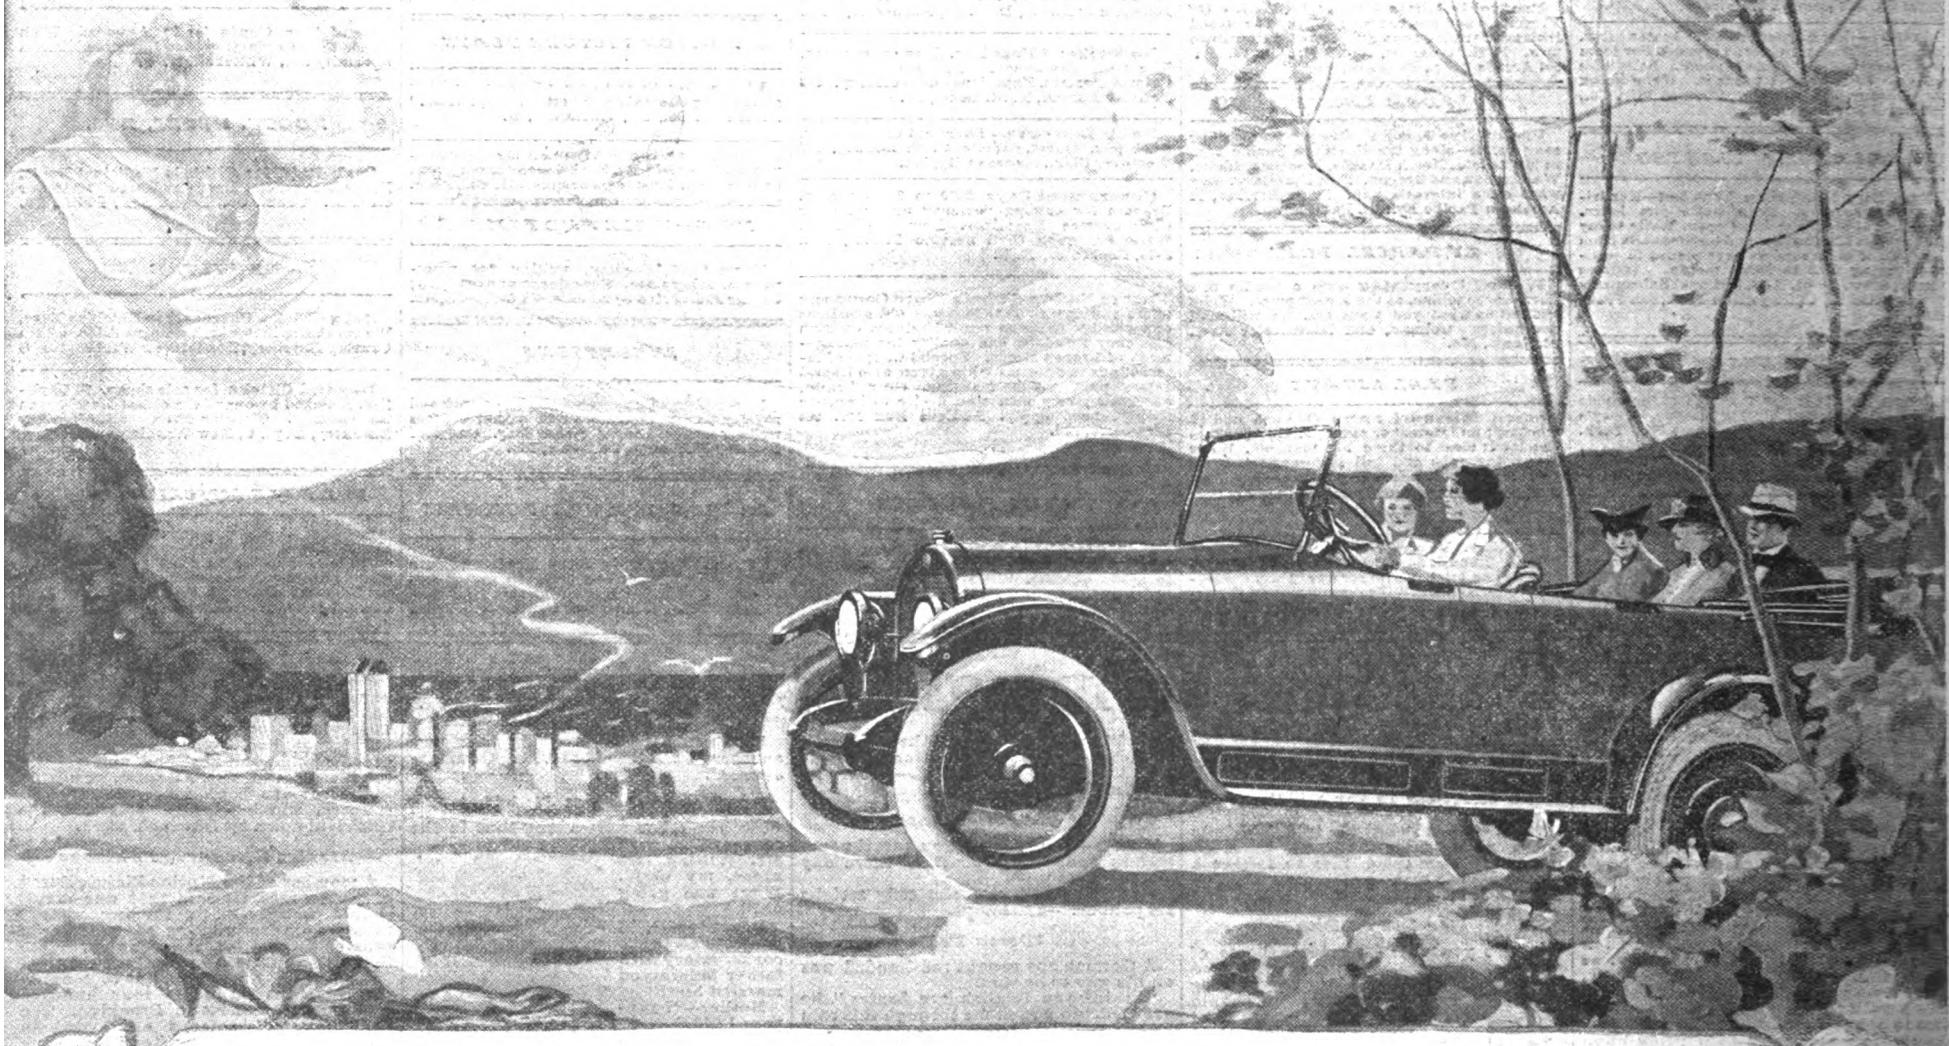
600-Year Old Snuff Box

Joseph A. Willard, of Delmar Township, Pa., has been exhibiting an ancient carved ivory snuff box. On the cover is inscribed "Susanna Willard, 1306." This heirloom is said to have come over in the Mayflower and has been handed down in the Willard family for 600 years.

Largest Area of Any City

Los Angeles, Cal., recently annexed two new suburbs and therefore can now boast of its covering the largest area of any city in the United States. New York standing second with 314 square miles, 23 square miles less than Los Angeles. Chicago takes third place with 198 square miles.

Longest Distance Wireless Message



What is thought to be the longest distance wireless message yet received, was reported by the steamship Venture, which recently arrived at Sidney, New South Wales. While en route from San Francisco, Cal., a message was picked up from Tuckerton, N. J., at a point 9,000 miles away.

Anniversary of Gas

The 100th anniversary of the introduction of gas for lighting purposes was celebrated in Baltimore, Md., recently. Baltimore is said to be the first city in the United States to use gas for lighting and to incorporate a gas company.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Productive Industry and Commercial Enterprise Must Not Be Crippled by Excessively Heavy War Taxes

THE fact that Congress has voted a war appropriation of seven billion dollars as a starter, while the war plans on foot and in prospect involve a probable expenditure exceeding that sum, indicates clearly enough that the government is in urgent need of a vast sum of money, all of which must be obtained from the people by some means or other, for they are the source from which it must come. And it is equally clear that in order to enable them to furnish these funds the prosperity of the country must continue unimpared. To this end normal business conditions not only must not be seriously interfered with but the innumerable industries on which the earning capacity of the nation depends must thrive and even be stimulated and speeded up In other words the people must be busily employed producing and earning to an extent never before realized here and at the same time spending and consuming liberally, for, let it be emphasized, that any considerable curtailment of consumption will surely result in the closing of many industrial establishments and thereby throw out of employment many hands, demoralize business and reduce the earning power of labor and capital.

Production and consumption are equally indispensable links in the endless chain of prosperity. Therefore the tendency which present high prices have toward reduction of consumption must not be materially aggravated by excessively high taxation which, according to the form in which it is applied, will either cripple industry in the first instance or work the same havoc secondarily by reducing the purchasing power of the people.

How, then, is the government to obtain the necessary funds with which to carry on the war? There are but two possible ways. Taxation is one and borrowing is the other. It has been decided, as a matter of course, that both means are to be used, and the only question is as to the respective proportions in which they shall be employed Congress has already ordered the issuance of two billion dollars of government bonds (the so-called Liberty Loan) and they are now being offered for sale to the people. But for two months Congress has been considering and, at the present writing (June 8th), is still undecided as to how much shall be raised by war taxes. As pointed out, this is a question of vital consequence.

We expect, and the country can stand, a considerable increase of taxes during the war, provided the increase is not excessive and is so apportioned and applied as not to unduly burden and cripple any industry nor largely reduce the purchasing power of the people by absorbing their earnings in large direct and indirect taxes. But the war revenue bill which the House of Representatives in its obsession by the fetish of raising as much money as possible by taxation, regardless of consequences concocted and passed is a monstrosity of unwisdom and will be disastrous to the country unless radically reformed before finally enacted It aimed to raise nearly two billion dollars the first year by a variety of taxes many of them oppressive and some so excessively heavy as to threaten the crippling or destruction of important industries. A deaf ear was turned to the remonstrances that poured in from all sections of the country, and arguments and pleas for rational and considerate action were met with the stupid excuse "the government needs the money and we can not bother to look into and rectify the defects and injustices of the bill" The remark of one of the leaders who, after acknowledging various defects in the bill, said "I shall shut my eyes and vote for it," reflects the unreasonable attitude of mind that swayed the House.

The bill is now in the Senate Finance Committee which has listened with respectful attention to all interested parties who wished to be heard It is expected that, on recommendation of its committee, the Senate will amend the bill so as to reduce the total of the first year's war tax to or below one billion and one half and eliminate the glaringly unjust, unwise and excessively burdensome features—in other words, make it over into a livable taxation plan which will permit the country to prosper so that by means of continued prosperity it can sustain the burdens of war. Of course this means that if less is raised by immediate taxation more will have to be procured by borrowing. But if prosperous the people will be willing and financially able to lend the government all the money it can possibly require. Furthermore, the difference in the amount to be borrowed in consequence of mitigating the proposed war taxes will be less than the figures would seem to indicate, because of the known fact that a moderately large tax always produces more revenue than an excessively heavy tax.

When the tax on a given article is raised to a certain point the price becomes nearly prohibitive and the consumption of the article declines to a degree that yields less revenue than a smaller tax which does not materially lessen consumption. The high tax, by reducing consumption, cuts down the market demand and imperils or destroys the industry which produces the article. There is one safe rule which should be the basic principle of our war taxes, and that is to put the taxes, reasonable taxes, on profits where practicable; this would impose no hardship on anybody and would distribute the burden in proportion to ability to bear it.

Everybody that Can Should Own a Liberty Bond

WE hope that every COMFORT reader, man, woman and child, that can scrape together fifty dollars or more of spare cash has subscribed for one or more Liberty Bonds according to his means. We would have mentioned this in our last month's editorial if the full details of the bonds had been obtainable before our June issue went to press. When this reaches our readers it will be too late to subscribe for bonds of the present issue, as subscriptions to this offering, which is limited to two billion dollars, closed June 15th. But other bond issues will be offered during the war to meet the government's needs; therefore all should know their duty and interest to help float the war loans.

To own a Liberty Bond is a good investment, good policy and a patriotic duty. It is a U. S. government bond, the safest investment in the world; you can have it registered in your name so that there will be no danger of loss by theft. It pays interest at the rate of three and one half per cent a year, payable twice a year, December and June. You can borrow money on it at any bank; it will have a market value the world over and be salable anywhere at any time. Principal and interest will be tax free; neither Federal or State government nor any county, city, town or district in the United States can tax you for it. They are war bonds sold by the government to raise money to carry on the war, as stated, and it is the patriotic duty of every citizen to help by buying them to the extent of his available means. Men of wealth, the banks, insurance companies and large corporations have bought heavily of them. Like postage stamps, they are offered in large or small lots or single bonds at the same price to anybody and everybody.

It is good policy to subscribe for as many Liberty Bonds as you can pay for. Although wealthy individuals and large corporations have subscribed for large lots, a number of them for million dollar blocks or bigger, still these are not enough to cover such a large loan and the government has to rely on the great mass of the people of moderate means to come forward and invest their savings in the purchase of small blocks or single bonds. The bonds will be issued in denominations of $1000, $500, $100 and even as small as $50 each to come within the means of small investors. All banks, postmasters and express offices receive subscriptions, and if you are short of ready cash you can pay two per cent when you subscribe and your local bank will arrange for you to pay the balance in small installments. The government needs your money, wants everybody that possibly can to own a Liberty Bond and has made it easy for you to subscribe and buy on your own terms. The present issue has been over-subscribed but the small subscriptions will be given the preference in the allotment of bonds.

The government must have the necessary money for war purposes and as there are only two ways of obtaining it—borrowing and taxation—if each issue of the Liberty Loan is not fully subscribed the natural consequence will be to raise the war taxes above the contemplated rates. The plan, as explained, is to procure part by loan and part by increase of taxes. Is it not good policy for the people to buy the Liberty Bonds, which are an interest-paying investment, rather than to pay a larger share of the war expense by immediate war taxes? Is there any other escape from burdensomely high war taxes? Don't be deterred from buying these bonds by the expectation that there will be another war loan perhaps at a higher rate of interest. The government ought to be able to borrow all the money it needs at any time for three and one half per cent, but the possible contingency has been provided for by the government's specific agreement that in case it issues any later bonds at a higher interest rate during the war the bonds of the present issue shall be exchangeable for the bonds of the higher interest rate; the government will swap even with you, bond for bond.

Government to Guarantee Farmers a Minimum Price for Farm Produce

ONE of the most important war measures now under consideration by Congress is a bill to establish a guaranteed minimum price to producers of non-perishable agricultural products under regulations to be prescribed by the President. As the purpose of the bill is to induce the farmers to make the utmost effort to raise as large crops as possible by a government guaranty against loss through low prices in case of overproduction, it should have become law two months ago, before planting time had passed. Present indications point to its adoption within the next few weeks, but the delay, already too long, in acting on it is inexcusable under the existing exigency and impending danger of a world famine. Under any circumstances it is a reasonable, proper and much needed measure with every reason in its favor and none against it; in the present crisis it is imperative.

By bitter experience the farmers have learned the disastrous effect of overproduction, of too large crops which depress prices below the cost of production. A comparatively small surplus over what is required for the year's consumption drives prices down to a losing figure Therefore the farmers aim not to produce a surplus and consequently the surplus carried over from one year to another in this country is so small that an extensive crop failure any year is likely to put the entire country on short rations. So we live under the continual menace of famine. The speculators buy the crops as cheap as they can, carry over the surplus and take a chance of realizing a profit by a short crop the following season. The only remedy is for the government to stand ready to buy the surplus, however large, at a fair, living price and store it as a safeguard against famine in case of one or more years of general crop failure. This is the only way whereby the farmers can be assured of fair prices and the country protected against famine and the consumer against extortionate speculative prices.

The roll when completed is straight, with a thread the length of roll along its side. The length or size of a roll is regulated by the number of times the thread is thrown over; o., over, thread over hook the number of times indicated; k. st., knot stitch, draw out loop about one quarter inch, catch thread and pull through, then put the hook between the drawn loop and the thread just pulled through, catch the thread, draw through these two stitches to form the knot; blk., block, a st. in each of a given number of sts., preceded and followed by a space; sp., space, a space is formed by making a chain of 3 or 4 sts. and omitting the same number of sts. in preceding row; sk., skip, to miss or omit number of stitches indicated in preceding row; p. c., padding cord; * stars mean that the directions given between them should be repeated as indicated before proceeding.

Crocheted Photograph Frames

THESE attractive frames were submitted by Miss Gracia Shull and are original designs worked out with coarse ecru crochet cotton. The work is simple and the directions plain so one should have no difficulty in duplicating these effective frames which will help solve the problem of preserving some of the numerous snap shots.

After finishing each frame, tack to pasteboard on which the photograph has been previously mounted, or if one prefers these frames can be stretched and tacked to a board so the shape will be as nearly perfect as possible and then stained a nut brown, bronze green or mahogany and after becoming thoroughly dry, varnished. Or just a coat of clear varnish or shellac may be applied without the stain.

Crocheted Round Frame

Make a chain the desired length and join. Around the ch. work 4 rows of single crochet.

5th row.—* ch. 3, sl. 1, cluster in next, ch. 3, sl. 1, 1 s. c. in next, repeat from * around. Above this work 1 s. c. in cluster, ch. 5, 1 s. c. in next cluster around; over the ch. work 4 more rows of single crochet.

Edge

Same as 5th row. Flower, ch. 6, form ring, 5 d. c. with ch. 2, between over half of ring, ch. 12, d. c. 12 along ch., repeat twice, 1 s. c. at end of each petal, * ch. 5, 1 d. c., 1 over d. c; repeat * until there are 4 sps., 1 s. c. at beginning of first, 1 st., ch. 12, work 6 s. c. over each ch. 5.

The stem and leaves are chains of the desired length covered with double crochet.

The loop at top is a ch. 12 covered with single crochet. If the frame does not lie flat in center work a row of s. c. around inner edge skipping every 5th or 6th st.

Crocheted Oblong Frame

Make a chain of the length desired for the photograph and join ends with 1 sl. st. Work 3 rows of single crochet around the chain.

4th row.—Shell in first st., * sl. 3 s. c. in previous row, shell in next; repeat from * around.

CROCHETED ROUND FRAME.

5th and 6th rounds.—Shell in shell to end of round. Ch. 12 for the loop and s. c. 1 at sp. between next 2 shells, turn and cover the ch. 12 with single crochet. The frame may be made wider if wanted by adding more rows of shells.

Oval Frame

Make a length of chain and join the ends with 1 sl. st. Work one row of s. c. along the ch.

2nd row.—Spaces made by working 1 d. c. in every other st. and ch. 2 between. Outside of the spaces work 6 rows of single crochet.

8th row.—Spaces.

9th row.—Single crochet with a ch. 5 picot over each d. c. in previous row. Now work a row of s. c. along the inner edge skipping every fifth st. of foundation ch. The flower is made as follows. Ch. 8. form ring, 8 d. c. with ch. 5 between in ring.

2nd row.—* 1 s. c. in sp., 8 d. c. in next sp; repeat from * until there are 4 petals.

3rd row.—* 1 s. c. at back of petals, ch. 7; repeat from * around.

4th row.—1 s. c., d. c., 1 s. c. over each ch. 7. Work remainder of points thus, 1 s. c. on 1 d. c. 7 times, turn. 1 s. c. on 1 s. c. 6 times, turn; 1 s. c. on 1 s. c. 5 times, turn; 1 s. c. on 1 s. c. 4, 3 and 2 times with a turn at the end then slip down side of point and begin next point. The stem is a chain of the desired length covered with d. c. At about the center of the ch. are two chains of 15 st. each covered with 6 and 5 spaces. The flower is fastened to the frame with a few firm stitches. The crocheted cover is attached to the cardboard cover (previously covered with linen or crash) by means of small even stitches crossed over the back of frame.

CROCHETED OVAL FRAME.

Tatted Insertion and Edging for Towel Ends.

TATTED EDGING AND INSERTION FOR TOWEL END. By Mrs. Frank Beal.

Relief Work Knitting

Now that our own men will probably be in the trenches another winter every woman should do her bit by knitting every moment possible, for woolen sweaters, socks, hemlets, scarfs, mittens, etc. will be needed in immense quantities. To aid in this work each month we will publish directions for some of the articles used by the soldiers.

Scotch knitting yarn in either mixed grey or Khaki shades should be used.

Sleeveless Army Sweater

Material required. 4 hanks Scotch knitting yarn and 1 pair No. 8 knitting needles.

Cast on 84 sts. Rib 2 inches deep by knitting 3 sts. and purling 3 sts., alternately.

Then knit 1 whole row. Then purl 1 whole row until sweater measures 23 inches including the border.

The neck hole is made as follows: K. 25 sts., bind off as loosely as possible 34 sts., k. 25 sts., knit 25 sts. plain until one has 4 ribs on the right side of the work and the work ends towards the inside of the neck. Break off wool.

Tie wool in at beginning of the 25 sts. which have been carried on back and k. plain until there are 4 ribs to correspond with other side.

Then cast on 34 sts. and pick up and knit the other 25 sts. Purl the next whole row across and knit the next row and alternate as in the beginning until the work measures 21 inches and is even with the back.

Knit and purl the border as before directed until 2 inches in depth.

Bind off very loosely, sew up sides leaving 10 inches for each armhole.

Army Muffler

Material required.—2 hanks Scotch knitting, 1 pair amber knitting needles No. 3, 1 bone crochet hook No. 3.

Cast on 70 sts., knit plain until scarf measures 1 1-2 yards, bind off. If one knits loosely less stitches will be necessary as width of scarf should only be 12 inches.

Fringe

Wind the yarn around cardboard 4 inches wide, cut yarn in strands 8 inches long and knot 4 strands in every other st. with crochet hook, on both ends of muffler.

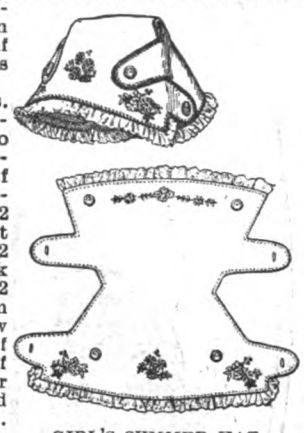
Knitted Hemlet

Material required—1 hank Scotch knitting, 2 pair steel knitting needles No. 8.

Cast on each of 2 needles 34 sts. and on third needle 32 sts., k. in rounds of k. 2, p. 2, for 12 inches, bind off 24 sts. loosely for opening, then k. in rib of k. 2, p. 2, on the 76 sts. for 2 inches, then cast on 24 sts. where they were bound off, k. in rounds again of k. 2, p. 2, for 2 inches.

To Shape the Crown of Head

1st round.—Decrease as follows; * k. 18, narrow, repeat from * to end of round.



2nd round.—K. plain.

Repeat first and second rounds alternately have 1 st. less between each of the narrowing points every other round, until there are 25 sts. left, bind off and draw together firmly and fasten.

Girl's Summer Hat

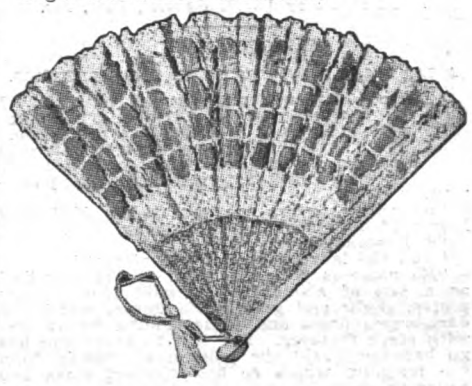
This little washable hat for a baby girl of a year and a half to two years is very dainty and attractive, most easily made and also laundered as it can be opened by unbuttoning the sides and ironed flat.

White linen figure or other white mercerized material of similar weight can be used. A half yard of goods will make two.

GIRL'S SUMMER HAT.

Measurements.—Through center from front to back 11 1-2 inches. Center of crown.—Narrowest part 5 1-2 inches. Front lower edge 11 1-2 inches. Back lower edge 10 1-2 inches. From these points draw lines to center of crown. One half inch up on either side of front, add 2-inch straps. And two inches up from back edge add 3-inch strap. Now cut out in one piece, rounding ends of straps a little.

Finish all edging by buttonholing around with pink or blue mercerized pearl cotton after which add groups of small flowers. These have yellow French knot centers, surrounded by row of quarter inch stitches worked from center outward. Finish with small pearl buttons and a ruche of net or fulled lace along lower edges.



Crocheted Fan

By Lydia M. Dearborn

A novel way of covering a fan was worked out by one of our California readers.

One spool of mercerized cotton and a steel crochet hook is all that is necessary.

Begin with a chain 46 stitches.

CROCHETED FAN.

1st row.—Ch. 4, 2 d. c. in 2nd st., 3 d. c. in every other st. around, making 23 groups of doubles.

2nd row.—Ch. 4, 3 d. c. on 1st group of 3 d. c., 4 d. c. on all the rest.

3rd row.—Same as 2nd row.

4th row.—6 d. c. on every group of doubles.

5th row.—Ch. 5, 2 tr. c. in first group, ch. 3, 2 tr. c. on each remaining group.

6th row.—Ch. 5, 2 tr. c. on each group with ch. 3 between.

7th row.—3 tr. c. on each, 2 tr. c., ch. 3 between.

8th row.—4 tr. c. on each group, ch. 3 between.

9th row.—Same as 8th row.

10th row.—6 tr. c. on each group, ch. 3 between.

11th, 12th and 13th rows.—Same as 10th row.

14th and 15th rows.—3 tr. c., ch. 3.

16th row.—11 tr. c., ch. 3.

Finish scallop with picot of ch. 4, 1 s. c., repeat all round.

Measure on fan to be covered and if necessary vary the size by omitting or adding rows as is necessary. When finished slip the sticks or spokes of the fan through the openings and hold in place by piercing holes in the sticks and catching the covering in place with needle and thread. Finish with cord and tassel to match. Ribbon of proper width can be run in to cover the sticks, as here shown, if desired.

Tatting for Hat Band

Begin with ring of 7 picots, then with shuttle and spool make two double stitches and picots repeated, until 3 picots are made. Now, with spool, make a small three-picoted ring. With shuttle and spool make 2 double stitches and picot repeated until 3 picots are counted. Make another 7-picoted ring. Join this to the first ring made at the third picot. Proceed as before until six of the seven picoted rings and five large points are made.

TATTING FOR HAT BAND.

With spool and shuttle make two double stitches and picot repeated until three picots are counted. Make a small 3-picoted ring and another 3-picoted bar. Now make a 7-picoted ring and join it to the point of the last large point, at the third picot of the ring.

Tatting Book Notice

In response to the demand and for the benefit of our readers who are interested in tatting, we have issued a 16-page booklet of special designs by COMFORT workers.

This Tatting Book illustrates very plainly just how the work is to be done, by showing the various positions of the worker's hands, which are accompanied by explicit directions for the different movements used in making the stitch.

It also contains a complete range of patterns from the simplest edgings and insertions to handsome designs worked with one and two threads, including patterns for doilies, centerpieces, scarfs, lingerie, waists, yokes, collars, infants' and boudoir caps, bags, etc.

We will send a copy of this book free for one new yearly subscription (not your own) at 25c., or for your own subscription or renewal and ten cents extra 35c in all. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

The Masked Bridal

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

He beckoned to the driver of a carriage as he spoke.

"Yes," Edith confessed.

"Come now," she said, holding out a hand to her.

He repaired to his club, where he wrote a letter to his client.

CHAPTER XXIV.

A SAD STORY DISCLOSED TO AN EAGER LISTENER.

"I DO not undertstand you, sir. I think you have made a mistake; this lady is under my protection."

"But I have orders to intercept a person answering to this lady's description," returned the policeman.

"By whose orders are you acting, if I may inquire?" demanded the young man.

"A Boston party."

"And the lady's name, if you please?"

"No name is given, sir; but she is described as a girl of about twenty, pure blonde, very pretty, slight and graceful in figure, wearing a dark-brown dress and jacket and a brown hat with black feathers. She will be alone and has no baggage," said the policeman, reading from the telegram which he had received some two hours previous.

Mr. Bryant smiled loftily.

"Your description hits the case in some respects, I admit," he observed, with an appreciative glance at Edith, who stood beside him outwardly calm and collected, though the hand that rested upon his arm was tense with repressed emotion, "but in others it is wide of its mark. You have her personal appearance, in a general way, and the dress happens to correspond in everything but the hat. You will observe that the lady wears a black hat with a scarlet wing instead of a brown one with black feathers. She did not arrive alone, either, as you perceive, we got off the train together."

The officer looked perplexed.

"What may your name be, sir, if you please?" he inquired, with more civility than he had yet shown.

"Royal Bryant, of the firm of Bryant & Co., Attorneys. Here is my card, and you can find me at my office between the hours of nine and four any day you may wish," the young man frankly returned, as he slipped the bit of pasteboard into the man's hand.

"And will you swear that you are not aiding and abetting this young lady in trying to escape the legal authority of friends in Boston?" questioned the policeman.

"Ahem! I was not aware that I was being examined under oath," responded the young lawyer, with quiet irony. "However, I am willing to give you my word of honor, as a gentleman, that this lady is accountable to no one in Boston for her movements."

"Well, I reckon I have made a mistake; but where in thunder, then, is the girl I'm after?" muttered the officer.

"Does your telegram authorize you to arrest a runaway from Boston?" Mr. Bryant inquired.

"Yes, a girl from the smart set, who don't want any scandal over the matter," replied the man.

"But she may not have come by the Boston and Albany line," objected Mr. Bryant. "There are several trains that leave the city from different stations about the same time; you may find your bird on a later train, Mr. Officer," he concluded, in a reassuring tone.

"That is so," was the thoughtful response.

"Then I suppose you will not care to detain us any longer," Mr. Bryant courteously remarked. "Come Edith," he added, turning with a smile to his companion, and then he started to move on.

"Hold on! I'm blamed if I don't think I'm right after all," said the policeman, in a tone of conviction, as he again placed himself in their path.

Royal Bryant flashed a look of fire at him.

"Have you a warrant for the lady's arrest?"

"No; I am simply ordered to detain her until her friends can come on and take charge of her," the man reluctantly admitted, while he heaved a sigh for the fat plum that had been promised him in the event of his "bagging his game."

"Then, if you are not legally authorized in this matter, I would advise you, as a friend, to make no mistake," gravely returned the young lawyer. "You might heap up wrath for yourself; while, if your patrons are anxious to avoid a scandal, you are taking the surest way to create one by interfering with the movements of myself and my companion. This young lady is my friend, and, as I have already told you, under my protection; as her attorney, also, I shall stand no nonsense, I assure you."

"Beg pardon, sir; but I'm only trying to obey orders," apologized the official. "But would you have the goodness to tell me this young lady's name."

"Certainly," he responded, with the utmost cheerfulness, "this lady's name is Miss Edith Allandale, and she is the daughter of the late Albert Allandale of Allandale & Capen, bankers."

"It is all right, sir," said the officer, at last convinced that he had made a mistake, for Allandale & Capen had been a well-known firm to him. "You can go on," he added, touching his hat respectfully, "and I beg pardon for troubling you."

Without more ado he turned away, while Edith and her escort passed on, but the frightened girl was now trembling in every limb.

"Calm yourself, dear," whispered her companion, involuntarily using the affectionate term, as he hastened to lead her into the fresh air. "You are safe, and I will soon have you in a place where your enemies will never think of looking for you."

He beckoned to the driver of a carriage as he spoke, and in another minute was assisting Edith into it; then, taking a seat beside her, he gave the man his order, and as the vehicle moved away in the darkness, the poor girl began to breathe freely for the first time since alighting from the train.

Mr. Bryant gave her a little time to recover herself, and then asked her to tell him all her trouble.

This she was only too glad to do; and, beginning with the death of her mother, she poured out the whole story of the last three months to him, dwelling mostly, however, upon the persecutions of Emil Correlli and the climax to which they had recently attained.

"I was in despair," Edith finally remarked in conclusion, "until yesterday, when, by the merest chance, my eye fell upon that advertisement of yours and it flashed upon me that the best course for me to pursue would be to come directly to New York and seek your aid; I felt sure you would be as willing to help me as upon a previous occasion."

"Certainly I would—you judged me rightly," the young man responded, "but"—bending nearer to her and speaking in a slightly reproachful tone—"tell me, please, what was your object in leaving New York so unceremoniously?"

"I—I thought it was best," she faltered.

"Why for the 'best'?—for you or for me? Tell me, please," he pleaded, gently.

"For—both," she replied.

"I—you will pardon me if I speak plainly—I thought it very strange," he remarked gravely. "It almost seemed to me as if you were fleeing from me, for I fully expected that you would return to the office on Thursday morning, as I had appointed. Had I done anything to offend you or drive you away—Edith?"

"No—oh, no," she quickly returned.

"I am very glad to know that," said her companion, a slight tremulousness in his tones, "for I have feared that I might have betrayed my feelings in a way to wound or annoy you; for, Edith—I can no longer keep the secret—I had learned to love you with all my heart during that week that you spent in my office, and I resolved, on parting with you at the carriage, the morning of your release, to confess the fact to you as soon as you returned to the office, ask you to be my wife and thus let me stand between you and the world for all time. Nay,"—as Edith here made a little gesture as if to check him—"I must make a full confession now, while I have the opportunity. I was almost in despair when I received your brief note telling me that you had left the city and without giving me the slightest clew to your destination. All my plans, all my fond anticipations, were dashed to the earth, dear. I loved you so I felt that I could not bear the separation. I love you still, my darling—my heart leaped for joy this afternoon when I received your telegram. And now, while I have you here all to myself, I have dared to tell you of it, and beg you to tell me if there is any hope for me? Can you love me in return!—will you be my wife——?"

"Oh, hush! you forget the wretched tie that binds me to that villain in Boston," cried Edith.

"No tie binds you to him, dear," he whispered, tenderly. "Do you think I would have opened my heart to you thus if I had really believed you to be the wife of another?"

"Oh, do you mean that the marriage was not legal? Oh, if I could believe that!" Edith exclaimed.

"Tell me, Edith, if I can prove it to you, will there be hope for me?" he whispered.

Ought she to answer him as her heart dictated? Dare she confess her love with that stigma of her mother's early mistake resting upon her? she asked herself, in anguish of spirit.

"I—dare not tell you," she murmured at last.

"You 'dare' not tell me!" he cried, joyfully. "Darling, I am answered already! But why do you hesitate to open your heart to me?"

A sudden resolve took possession of her; she would tell him the whole truth, let come what might.

"I will not," she said. "I have a sad story to tell you; but first, explain to me what you meant when you said that no tie binds me to that man?"

"I meant that that marriage was simply a farce, in spite of the sacrilegious attempt of your enemies to legalize it," said the young lawyer, gravely.

"Can that be possible?" sighed Edith.

"I will prove it to you. You have told me that this man Correlli lived with that Italian woman here in New York for two years or more."

"Yes."

"Do you know whether he allowed her to be known by his name?"

"No; but she told me that he allowed her to appear as his wife in the house where they lived."

"Well, then, if that can be proven—and I have not much doubt about the matter—the girl, by the laws of New York, which decree that if a couple live together in this state as husband and wife, they are such—this girl, I say, is the legal wife of Emil Correlli, consequently he can lay no claim to you without making himself liable to prosecution for the crime of bigamy."

"Are you sure?" breathed Edith.

"So sure, dear, that I have nothing to fear for your future, regarding your connection with this man, and everything to hope for regarding your happiness and mine, if you will but tell me that you love me," her lover returned, as he boldly captured the hand that lay alluringly near him.

She did not withdraw it from his clasp.

"Forgive my impatience, dear, and tell me the 'sad story' to which you referred a little while ago."

A heavy sigh escaped Edith.

"You will be surprised to learn," she began, "that Mr. and Mrs. Allandale were not my own parents—that I was their adopted daughter."

"Indeed! I am surprised!" exclaimed Mr. Bryant.

"I did not discover the fact, however," the young girl pursued, "until the night after my mother's burial."

And then she proceeded to relate all that had occurred in connection with the box of letters which Mrs. Allandale had desired, when dying, to be burned.

She told of her subsequent examination of them, especially of those signed "Belle," and the story which they had revealed.

Royal Bryant listened to the pathetic tale without once interrupting the fair narrator, and Edith's heart sank more and more in her bosom as she proceeded, and feared that she was so shocking him by these revelations that his affection for her would die with this expose of her secret.

But he still held her hand clasped in his; and when, at the conclusion of her story, she gently tried to withdraw it, his fingers closed more firmly over hers, when, bending still nearer to her, he questioned, in fond, eager tones:

"Was this the reason of your leaving New York so abruptly last December?"

"Yes."

"Was it because you loved me and could not trust yourself to meet me day after day without betraying the fact when you feared that the knowledge of your birth might become a barrier between us? Tell me, my darling, truly!"

"Yes," Edith confessed; "but how could you guess it—how could you read my heart so like an open book?"

"'Tis said that 'love is blind,'" he said, "but mine was keen to read the signs I coveted, and I believed, even when you were in your deepest trouble, that you were beginning to love me, and that I should eventually win you."

"Why! did you begin to——" Edith began.

"Did I begin to plan to win you so far back as that?" he laughingly exclaimed, and putting his own interpretation upon her half-finished sentence. "My darling, I began to love you and to wish for you even before your first day's work was done for me."

CHAPTER XXV.

A NEW CHARACTER IS INTRODUCED.

"And now, love," the eager wooer continued, as he dropped the hand he had been holding and drew the happy girl into his arms, "you will give yourself to me—you will give me the right to stand between you and all future care or trouble?"

"Then you do not mind what I have just told you?"

"Not in the least, only so far as it occasions your unhappiness or anxiety," replied the young man. "You are unscathed by it—the sin and the shame belong alone to the man who ruined the life of your mother. You are my pearl, my fair lily, unspotted by any blight, and I should be unworthy of you, indeed, did I allow what you have told me to prejudice me in the slightest degree. Now tell me, Edith, that henceforth there shall be no barrier between us—tell me that you love me."

"How can I help it?" she murmured.

"And will you be my wife?"

"Oh, if it is possible—if I can be," she faltered. "Are you sure that I am not already bound?"

"Leave all that to me—do not fret, even for one second, over it," her lover tenderly returned. Then he added, more lightly: "I am so sure, sweetheart, that tomorrow I shall bring you a letter which will proclaim to all whom it may concern, that henceforth you belong to me."

He lifted her face when he ceased speaking, pressed his first caress upon her lips.

A little later he inquired:

"And have you no clew to the name of your parents?"

"No; all the clew that I have is simply the name of 'Belle' that was signed to the letters of which I have told you," Edith replied, with a regretful sigh.

"It is perhaps just as well, dear, after all," said her lover, cheerfully; "if you knew more, and should ever chance to meet the man who so wronged your mother, it might cause you a great deal of unhappiness."

"I have not a regret on his account," said Edith, bitterly; "but I would like to know something about my mother's early history and her friends. I have only sympathy and love in my heart for her, in spite of the fact that she erred greatly in leaving her home as she did, and, worse than all, in taking her own life."

"Poor little woman!" said Royal Bryant, with gentle sympathy; "despair must have turned her brain—she was more sinned against than sinning. But girls do not realize what a terrible mistake they are making when they allow men to persuade them to elope, leave their homes and best friends, and submit to a secret marriage. No man of honor would ever make such proposals to any woman—no man is worthy of any pure girl's love who will ask such a sacrifice on her part; and, in nine cases out of ten, I believe nothing but misery results from such a step."

"As in the case of poor Giulia Fiorini," remarked Edith, sadly. "But maybe she will be somewhat comforted when she discovers that she is Emil Correlli's legal wife."

"I fear that such knowledge will be but small satisfaction to her," her companion responded, "for if she should take measures to compel him to recognize the tie, he would doubtless rebel against the decision of the court; and, if she still loves him as you have represented, he would make her very wretched. However, he can be forced to make generous settlements, which will enable her to live comfortably and educate her child."

"And he will be entitled to his father's name, will be not?" inquired Edith, eagerly; "that would comfort her more than anything else."

"Yes, if he has ever acknowledged her as his wife, or allowed it to be assumed that she was, the child is entitled to the name," returned her lover. Then, as the carriage stopped, he added: "But here we are, my darling, and I am sure you must be very weary after your long journey."

"Yes, I am tired, but very, very happy," the fair girl replied, looking up into his face with a sigh of content.

He smiled fondly upon her as he led her up the steps of a modest but pretty house, between the draperies at the windows of which there streamed a cheerful light.

"Well, we will soon have you settled in a cozy room where you can rest to your heart's content," he remarked, and at the same time touching the electric button by his side.

"Really, Mr. Bryant, I cannot help feeling guilty to intrude upon an entire stranger at this time of night," Edith observed, in a troubled tone.

"You need not, dear, for I assure you Nellie will be delighted; but"—bending over her with a roguish laugh—"Mr. Bryant does not enjoy being addressed with so much formality by his fiancee. The name I love best—Roy—my mother gave me when I was a boy, and I want always to hear it from your lips after this."

A servant admitted them just at that moment, and upon responding to Mr. Bryant's inquiry, said that Mrs. Morrell was at home, and ushered them at once to her pretty parlor.

Presently the young hostess—a lady of perhaps twenty-five years—made her appearance and greeted her cousin with great cordiality.

"You know I am always glad to see you, Roy," she said, giving him both her hands and putting up her red lips for a cousinly kiss.

"I know you always make a fellow feel very welcome," said the young man, smiling. "And, Nellie, this is Miss Edith Allandale; she has just arrived from Boston, and I am going to ask you to receive her as your guest for a few days," he concluded, thus introducing Edith.

Mrs. Morrell turned smilingly to the beautiful girl.

"Miss Allandale is doubly welcome, for her own sake, as well as yours," was her gracious response, as she clasped Edith's hand, and if she experienced any surprise at thus having an utter stranger thrust upon her hospitality at that hour, she betrayed none, but proceeded at once to help her remove her hat and wraps.

Tears sprang to the eyes of the homeless girl at this cordial reception, and her lips quivered with repressed emotion as she thanked the gentle lady for it.

"What was that Roy was saying—that you have come from Boston this afternoon?" queried Mrs. Morrell, hastening to cover her embarrassment by changing the subject. "Then you must be nearly famished, and you must have a lunch before you go to rest."

"Pray, do not trouble yourself——" Edith began.

"Please let me—I like such 'trouble,' as you are pleased to term it," smilingly interposed the pretty hostess; and with a bright nod and a hurried "excuse me," she was gone before Edith could make further objections.

Fifteen minutes later she reappeared, a lovely flush on her round cheeks, her eyes bright with the pleasure she experienced in doing a kind act for the young stranger, toward whom she had been instantly attracted.

"Come, now," she said, holding out a hand to her, "and I know Roy will join us—he never yet refused a cup of tea of my own brewing."

"You are right, Nellie," smilingly replied that gentleman; "and I believe I am hungry, in spite of my hearty dinner at six o'clock. A ride over the pavements of New York will prepare almost anyone for an extra meal. I only hope you have a slice of Aunt Jane's old-fashioned gingerbread for me."

Mrs. Morrell laughed out musically at this last remark.

Then she led them into her home-like dining-room where a table was laid for three.

As soon as the meal was finished, Mrs. Morrell, who saw how weary and heavy-eyed the fair girl appeared, remarked to her cousin, with

THE letter below from "Kindling Wood" brings to mind a stirring editorial printed recently in a well-known and popular monthly magazine, to the effect that loyal American women can do their "bit" by practising efficiency and economy, as never before, in the home, and this writer goes even a step ahead of that by utilizing apparently waste products outside the home. Economy does not mean that we must deprive ourselves or families of nourishing food and sufficient clothing but rather devise a way to provide all this at less cost than ever before. This rests with each individual and no rule can be given to cover all cases. Let each of us do our best to keep the living expenses down to a reasonable limit and find our reward in the feeling of satisfaction that follows a duty well and cheerfully done.—Ed.

TERRE HAUTE, IND.

DEAR SISTERS:

In these strenuous times it behooves every loyal American to conserve even the seemingly insignificant products of nature. Apropos of this, if the industrious owner of a city lot will devote one little corner or a border to the growing of the sunflower, the result will be like the scriptural bread thrown upon the waters. The writer has for several years practised the preaching. Results:

A shielding from view of unsightly fences or outbuildings.

A shade from an otherwise too sunny chicken yard.

A feast for the eyes when the flowers burst into bloom.

Partial feed for the chickens.

The seed salable at the near by druggist—perhaps.

Some seed saved at home for medicinal purposes.

Last, but of most importance in the writer's estimation, the dried stalks allowed to stand long after flowers and leaves have disappeared, become of the consistency of wood and make excellent kindling. The writer used such stalks, broken into proper length, all winter to the exclusion of other kindling wood. Some of my neighbors thought this funny but since these warlike days, conservation may prove to them to be food for serious thought.

In this locality of middle Hoosierdom the beautiful catalpa tree flourishes. My neighbor's sidewalk holds two beautiful specimens whose blossoms, white, flecked with purple rays, charm by their fragrance each spring. Later on the long green pods or beans form. These, at first, seemed to be a constant nuisance, falling daily on the writer's clean strip of lawn from July on through fall into winter. However, instead of sweeping them into the gutter and burning them with the leaves as was done by most of the neighbors, I gathered and made them into small faggots, as they are from a foot to eighteen inches in length and very brittle when dry. These proved a good adjunct to the sunflower stalk kindling. Let him laugh who wins.

"Kindling Wood."

PORTSMOUTH, VA.

DEAR SISTERS:

I want to ask the mothers of large families for some advice. I have three children and all of them are bothered with adenoids and enlarged tonsils. My little girl, two and one half years old, is bothered some. She has weak spells. She will seem well and will be playing around when suddenly she will say, "I fall," and she falls to the floor unless I get to her in time. She becomes limp, can't walk, pale, her body quivers and her lips become purple. But she seems to be conscious and talks sometimes when she is in this spell. I have had two doctors and neither find anything wrong with her though one says it may be caused by her adenoids. I would like to know, through COMFORT, if any of the mothers have known of anything like it.

Mother of Three.

Mother of Three. If your children are troubled with adenoids and enlarged tonsils why don't you have them removd? It isn't a serious operation and shouldn't be so very expensive, and even if it is, it means more to your children than the same amount of money spent in other ways for their benefit for it must be something very important to rank higher than good health and I can't think of what it could possibly be. Ask your doctor about it.—Ed.

JASPER, R. R. B, BOX 116, FLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have just read my March COMFORT and certainly enjoyed the letters from the sisters, especially Mattie Mae's sunny letter. I wish I lived near her, for she is so different from a lot of people who go through the world with a long face, thinking they have all the troubles. Life is what we try to make it. I once learned a little verse that I try to use as a motto, but I sometimes fail:

"What's the use of worrying,
Worrying doesn't pay;
What's the use in hurrying,
That's the slowest way.
Half the whims that worry you
Do not ever come true.
Then why let them worry you
As they daily do?"

Let us hear from others on the in-law subject. I suppose there is much to be considered on that subject as every person is so different, but most give their likes and dislikes, particularly the latter, in angry words which when once spoken can never be recalled. I have a sister-in-law and I am sure I could not love a sister more devotedly.

In reply to the heated discussions on country and city life I can only say that I was born in the country and have always lived there and I would not exchange my free life there for the city.

I am twenty-four years of age, five feet, six inches tall and weigh one hundred and thirty-five pounds. Have brown hair and eyes and a rather browned complexion for I am a farmer's girl and work in the fields and I do not think it a disgrace. A great many girls would be better off today had they been satisfied to stay on the farm.

Long live dear old COMFORT is my wish. May you all remember the girl from the Sunny South.

AMY NELSON.

FITZPATRICK, GA.

DEAR SISTERS:

I am trying to get a wheel chair for my little invalid sister but as we live eight miles from a small town and in a thinly settled community, I find it very hard to get the necessary subscriptions, and I hope the sisters will help me so that she can have the chair this summer. She is ten years old and has had spinal trouble all her life. We are poor people and live on a farm and are not able to buy a chair for her. She needs one very much for she is getting larger and harder to care for and it would mean so much to her if she only had a chair. Won't you help me get one for her? We can give references.

Your friend in need, MARY E. LANIER.

TOPAZ, MO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am trying to get subscribers in order to get a wheel chair for little Willie Clinton. He is a shut-in, seven years old. He has white swelling in his knee joint and can't walk. There are seven children in the family and the parents are poor and it is very hard for his mother to care for him so I am asking all the sisters that can to help me get subscribers to get the chair for him. His address is Omba, Mo. and he would be glad to get post-cards or pictures if anyone cares to send them to him.

I live about eighteen miles from a railroad and as I have four little children of my own it is hard for me to get out so I hope you will help me get the chair for him.

Best wishes to all, MRS. MYRTLE MCCARTY.

Sisters. It is seldom that I make a direct appeal for wheel-chair subscriptions but the above letters touched me so deeply that I am publishing them in hopes that enough subscriptions will be secured to give each of these poor, suffering children a wheel chair before the summer is over. It means so much to them and so little to us—and every club, no matter how small, helps.—Ed.

WILLIAMSTOWN, N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have long thought of writing to our delightful corner but my courage always failed me when I read the letters so brimful of helpful suggestions and inspiring little sermons. We all ought to profit by them, they are uplifting and to the point.

I rather like the idea of descriptions. I fancy I can see some of the sisters in some of their well-meant, spirited conversations.

I am five feet two inches tall, weigh about one hundred and twenty-five pounds and have brown eyes, medium complexion and a wealth of curly brown hair, which is my only redeeming feature.

I have one of the good Johns who neither chews, drinks nor smokes, only his name happens to be Harry. He doesn't believe these letters are real and I want to convince him they are.

We have five boys ranging in age from one to nine years, all full of fun and mischievous so you see I don't have a great deal of time for fancy-work, though I do a little between times as it tends to take the rough edge off the huge pile of necessary sewing and mending.

Let us all give three cheers for Frank and Martha and let us hear from you again Martha. You might give us a pen picture of the sideboard your good Frank made.

Frances Mae, I heartily agree with you in regard to Mrs. Pete. Many women of means would give half they possess for the opportunity that she finds so disagreeable, that of having their husband want to stay home.

Mattie Mae Clark, you certainly possess a cheerful disposition and come as a ray of sunshine to our corner. I think you did just the proper thing in answering the letter of the boy in jail. Some poor mother's heart is breaking, and who knows but what your cheerful letter has been the means of starting him right again. That was a fine little sermon you gave us. Come often, for there is a world of good in your letters.

Mrs. Sue Lorenz Johnson, you surely have the true Christmas spirit and I judge from your letter that your prayers will not be in vain.

Mrs. Nettie McClure, I would like to shake hands with you and would give all young couples the same advice you have given—a camping outfit or a log cabin; this is from one who knows.

Poor Georgie is getting it from all parts of the globe. Well, the least said the better, but I hate to think what would become of our five boys, bubbling over with life, should I be compelled to move to the city.

Mrs. L. M. Craig, I do not agree with you about encouraging children to write on the wall and woodwork; give them a piece of wrapping paper and pencil. True, they will not think it so much fun but it looks better and will save you work, and that is what we are all striving for now, to make our heads save our heels.

Lonely One of Texas, stop and think of the millions of women who have done several times what you are dreading just once. I have a large family and am still very much alive. Let us hear from you a year from now.

I would just love to take a peep in at Mrs. Wilkinson's cozy fireside and see her with her happy little family around her. I feel sure she has one, seeing she has no poodle dog.

May God bless Uncle Charlie, Mrs. Wilkinson and all of COMFORT'S staff in the noble work they are doing is the wish of POLLY COPELAND.

Polly. I like your nom de plume, for there's something cheery and homey about the name of Polly, and any time you choose to honor my humble fireside with your presence you will receive a hearty welcome. This applies to all.—Ed.

FIRTH, NEBR.

GOOD AFTERNOON MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am very glad to be able to meet you all for a little while this afternoon.

In response to request—"How to can mixed vegetables for soup," I will give recipe which is of my own origin and which anyone can use successfully without the use of any canner, if they are able to can tomatoes successfully. Many failures in tomato canning are due to the presence of bacteria which cannot be destroyed at a temperature of 212 degrees F., which is the temperature attained when cooking tomatoes in pans or open kettles for canning. The sources of such bacteria is growing tomatoes on ground where fertilizers impregnated with objectionable bacteria have been employed. These same tomatoes if sterilized at a higher temperature would keep and be perfectly wholesome; of course to sterilize at a higher temperature tomatoes in the jars or cans and employ a canning or sterilizing device which will give a temperature of a higher degree than can be obtained with the ordinary utensils generallly employed in cannning.

Now for the recipe. Canned Vegetable Soup.—It must be remembered that in canning of vegetables "blanching" is a very important part of the work. Therefore it will be necessary to blanch all of the vegetables called for in this recipe except the tomatoes, which almost anyone will be obliged to use from their canned supply. Because it seldom happens that the carrots are sufficiently matured, or the cabbage ripe enough, or that the onions have passed the milk stage while the tomatoes are yet in season, so it is best to make the soup later in the season using well matured products and canned tomatoes than to make it early when tomatoes are in season and the other vegetables unmatured.

It is necessary to have vegetables prepared for cooking or canning before blanching. Therefore, peel and dice one quart of carrots, peel and dice one half quart of onions, slice two quarts of cabbage, cut in short lengths one quarter quart of celery (in the absence of celery use one tablespoon celery seed or it may be omitted if the taste desires).

The above are now ready for blanching and each vegetable should be blanched separately.

To "blanch" place the vegetable in a clean cloth sack or a fine mesh wire basket and lower it into a kettle of boiling water, allow the water to boil up through the vegetable five minutes. Now lift the sack or basket out and lower same into a pail of cold water; continue to blanch and cool until each vegetable has been thus treated.

Now boil each vegetable separately until done. The reason for this is that some require longer cooking than others.

When done the vegetables are ready for mixing; add one quart canned tomatoes, salt to taste and a pinch of cayenne pepper or one half small red pepper, chopped fine. Boil the whole briskly one half hour to blend flavors. While still boiling fill into jars and seal. It will keep perfectly and be liked by everyone.

The directions seem lengthy but really the work isn't difficult and I believe almost anyone would prefer to pay for available foodstuffs with labor as the price, than to be compelled to undergo the strain that results from too much "headwork" in trying to make certain amounts of money buy the hundred and one things so sorely needed. GRACE DIETZ.

ASTORIA, 139 Fulton Ave., L. I., N. Y.

DEAR SISTERS:

In the March number several sisters were incensed by Georgie's statements in regard to farm life. I was born in New York City but spent three years on a farm in New Jersey. I love country life but I think farm work very hard with so little returns for the energy spent. But the city dweller has none of the freedom, independence, pure air, and fresh food of the farm. Though to tell the truth, most farmers sell their fresh products to buy poorer substitutes. I know of several who sell fresh butter to buy oleo, their milk for condensed milk, their eggs and chickens for salt pork. Very often the only roast chicken a farmer gets is at a chicken supper held at some neighboring church.

Where our farm is located neither the grown folks nor the children know the names of the most common birds and flowers. Not fifty miles from a big city yet most of the children have never heard of George Washington or know who our present president is, or any of the current events. The children of this community are far from healthy and their vocabulary is shocking.

Of course not all country people are so ignorant; in fact, in some sections they are far better educated than the average city folks, but most farmers haven't the time, money or opportunity for education, books and newspapers.

I love the country, the growing things, the birds and animals. My only recreations are walking and reading and I never get enough of either.

With love, MARY HEINSOHN.

Mary Heinsohn. To quote a story I read recently I feel like saying, "Mary, Mary, be careful." Aren't you letting slip the chance of a lifetime to do some real missionary work? Start with the children first and get them interested in birds and flowers and then gradually work on up to the parents and that will be easy if you win the children over to your side. Possibly some of our readers may be able to assist you by means of letters to this corner, which I shall be glad to publish.—Ed.

DENMARK, MISS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I'll take a chair over here by Mrs. Pete as she wanted advice from the readers.

Mrs. Pete, you say your husband is good and kind to you and you know he loves you but he is inclined to want to stay at home. Can't you be as contented with him now, that he is your husband, as you were before you married him? Were not your happiest moments spent with him then? Hadn't you rather be with him than anyone else or in a crowd? Dear sister, if he is good and kind to you and loves you and you love him, my advice would be for you to give up your good times and try to be contented with him. What if you knew he didn't care much about you and was never at home and you had to spend most of the time alone, or, possibly with two little ones, then you would feel lonely enough. Supposing, too, that your own people lived miles and miles away and you couldn't see them more than twice or three times a year. Think of all these things. I am sure you never have given the matter a second thought.

You say you never lived in the country before. Of course you will be lonely until you get accustomed to it.

Mrs. Pete, let us hear from you again.

Wishing a long life to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters, A Hungry Heart.

PREBLE, N. Y.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Once I borrowed a copy of COMFORT to read and liked it so much that I wanted to subscribe for it but lost the address. One day a friend 'phoned me, asking if I would give her my subscription to COMFORT and you can imagine how delighted I was for I can truthfully say that it is my most welcome paper.

I enjoy the helpful letters which the good sisters send and in the April number I read one written by Mrs. Minnie Brubaker, Marion, Ind. and it made me homesick for my old home town is just a short distance from Marion, by trolley, known as Warren, Ind. I visited in Marion last fall. I am Hoosier by birth but now am living in a Yankee state and like it very much. Moved from Indiana two years ago to a farm in New York and lived there a little over a year but was not successful, owing to wet land. My husband now is a blacksmith and does a good business. This is a village of about eight hundred inhabitants. There are two churches, Methodist and Presbyterian, one large hotel, with bar which was voted out last fall. The scenery around here is beautiful.

I am twenty-five years old, tall and slender and weigh one hundred and forty-five pounds. Have brown hair and fair complexion. Was married when I was only seventeen years old and have a daughter seven years old.

Can anyone tell me a way to amuse a little girl, one that is full of life and wants to be doing something. She goes to school but after school hours and on Saturday she teases me to do something for her and I have completely run out of amusements. I have tried sewing and numerous household duties but she tires of that. She is full of music, being a singer since two years of age, but we have no musical instrument to entertain her. She sang a solo Easter Sunday. She is an only child.

As for Woman Suffrage, I pay no attention to it whatever, for I have all I can do at home. I do all my own work and sew some besides and I enjoy all of it.

How many ever made a peanut butter cake? Use the peanut butter for the cake instead of common butter and also put it between layers with the powdered sugar icing. It is fine.

With regards to all, I remain,
Sincerely yours, MRS. F. GARDNER.

Mrs. Gardner. Why not have your daughter make a garden, one that will be all her own. Buy tools suitable for her size and let her do all the work herself, taking care that she does not do

Thrift without Parsimony in the Kitchen

JUST as the soldier is judged by his willingness, by his considerateness, and by his courage, so will the women of this country be judged who are donning their kitchen aprons and so nobly responding to the great call for food conservation.

A few weeks have wrought great changes in our ideas of necessaries. We have discovered that many so-called "necessaries" were luxuries, and that patriotism has sounded the call for a readjustment of our domestic economy. Never was there a time when so much depended on the prudent management of their homes by American women; in fact their very best efforts are indispensable to our government, if we are to feed the armies in the field and the women and children of Europe made destitute by war.

Just as the soldier who guards the bridge is doing his bit toward the great end, so will the woman who guards well the resources at her command.

The study of food values, while for years much talked about, has received little attention. But now with the prices of food daily advancing, and an actual shortage in some sections, not only must food values be studied, but substitutes thought out.

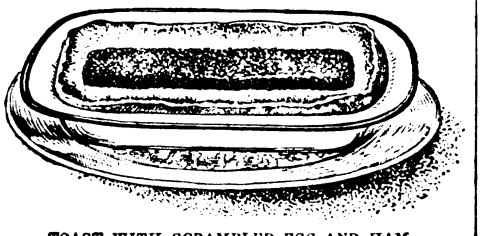
The following classification of foods may assist the housewife in planning three well-balanced meals each day:

1. Mineral matter, requisite to health, is contained in the vegetable salts; the body, regulating substances in the succulent vegetables and fruit acids.

2. Foods depended upon for protein are milk, eggs, meat, and dried peas, beans and lentils.

3. The starches are supplied in the breakfast cereal foods, meals, flours, and foods made from them.

4. Foods depended on to supply sugar, are the different sugars, molasses, syrups, honey, dried fruits, jams and preserves, cakes and desserts.



5. Butter, cream, vegetable oils, lard, suet, other cooking fats and oils, salt pork and bacon, supply our fats.

The above five groups of foods should be represented in the daily diet if the body is kept healthy. Strive to keep the balance right by not drawing too heavily from any one group for one meal. Keep the meals simple, and plan according to the requirements of the household.

Most housewives can manage to serve some kind of raw or cooked fruit once a day, and taken as a body-regulator, it is most valuable when served with the breakfast. Prunes soaked one hour in cold water, then rinsed, and more cold water added, and cooked in the oven without sugar, should be served several times a week. Alternate with fresh fruit, berries, stewed apricots, stewed raisins and dates with lemon juice added when cold. Fresh peaches are valuable in their effect on the system.

Breakfast Dishes

TOAST WITH SCRAMBLED EGG AND HAM.—First put serving dish where it will be hot when toast is made.

TOAST WITH SCRAMBLED EGG AND HAM.

Cut bread moderately thick and put in hot oven to dry through and brown. While this is being done, lightly beat three eggs, add three tablespoons of milk, a pinch of salt and pepper. In a saucepan put two level tablespoons of butter, and when it bubbles, add the egg mixture and three tablespoons of chopped cold boiled ham. Cook slowly, keeping it off the bottom of pan with a spoon. It should be creamy when done. Have a dish of boiling water, and taking one slice of toast at a time, turn it around in water to moisten the edges, then wet center by the spoonful, that too much water may not be used. Butter each layer, and spread the egg and ham on top.

SCALLOPED CALF'S BRAINS WITH POTATO.—Parboil and cut in inch pieces; sprinkle with salt, pepper and lemon juice. Put into a buttered baking dish, alternating with layers of buttered cracker crumbs, pepper and salt. Over the whole put one cup of tomato.

SCALLOPED CALF'S BRAINS WITH POTATO.

Bake one hour, turn out onto an earthern serving dish, cover with mashed potato pressed through a paper tunnel, return to the oven and brown. Garnish with a few small lettuce leaves just before serving.

CORN-MEAL GRIDDLE CAKES.—Two cups of corn-meal one cup of flour, six level teaspoons of baking powder, and one and one half level teaspoons of salt stirred together. Quickly add one and one half cups of milk and water mixed and stir smooth. Have ready a hot greased griddle or frying pan; drop by the spoonful so cakes will not touch after rising. Cook on slow fire until the cakes are brown on the lower side and the bubbles burst in the top. Turn each cake to brown on the other side. Serve hot with strips of fried bacon, and stewed or fresh fruit.

POTATO CAKES.—Mix left over mashed potato with scraps of meat, bacon or salt pork chopped fine. Add dressing or gravy, and bread crumbs to make the proper consistency; season well with pepper and salt, shape into cakes and fry a rich brown in drippings from any kind of meat. Serve with rhubarb sauce and toasted coarse bread.

OAT MEAL, FRUIT TOAST.—Oat meal should be cooked four hours in a double cooker, or over night in a fireless. Use three cups of boiling water to every cup of oat meal and one half teaspoon of salt. Serve with top milk.

FRUIT TOAST.—Use fairly thick slices of oven toast, butter and pour over stewed fruit of berries crushed with sugar. Serve with hot cocoa.

CODFISH OMELET.—In a saucepan, put one tablespoon of butter, and when it bubbles, smooth in two tablespoons of dry flour, and then add one third of a cup of hot milk, and one cup of codfish; cook slowly three minutes. Beat the yolks of two eggs until light and creamy, and add to fish mixture. Beat the egg whites until dry, fold into the fish mixture and pour into a hot buttered spider. Bake in a moderate oven until egg is cooked. Serve with corn bread and milk.

VEGETABLE HASH.—All kinds of vegetables will blend in preparing a vegetable hash. Chop medium fine, season with salt and pepper, pour into a well-greased iron frying pan and slowly brown. Fold once, and serve on a platter with slices of hot oven toast.

DRIED APRICOTS AND PEACHES.—Wash the fruit, soak over night in cold water, and slowly cook in the same water until tender. Add sugar to taste. A much finer consistency and flavor is procured by baking in a closely covered dish. Apricots combine well with prunes.

BAKED APPLES WITH RAISINS.—Core tart apples. Put in a baking dish, filling the cavities with brown sugar and seedless raisins. Bake in a quick oven. Put a little hot water in dish.

WHEN A NAIL WON'T DO IT

Nerine's Second Choice

by Adelaide Stirling

The woman stirred the fire and drew up a chair to it.

Suddenly the sitting room door flew open and in burst Joan.

"You can eat more if there is more to eat," Joan remarked with sound common sense.

CHAPTER XIX.

A STRANGE WOMAN.

IT was a long and somewhat doleful walk home again, and Nerine was not sorry when the next day proved wet, and the children sought distraction after lessons in making taffy in the kitchen.

She longed for a good walk, and set off, unobserved by her charges, just after lunch. She went inland for a change; the good hard country road was better walking in the rain than the sands, and she stepped out vigorously. Just whereabout, she wondered, did Mr. Fairfax live? She did not wish to meet him again, though he had been really very kind about Tommy.

The road grew lonely after she was out of the village and on the other side of the station, but it was pretty, with fields on one side and a copse on the other. She had walked on at a brisk pace for a mile or two when the rain suddenly increased to a downpour. The wind rose into a sharp squall and flung the big drops at her with drenching force. Nerine stopped and held her hat on while she looked about for shelter. It was only a squall, but even so, she was getting wetter than was cheerful.

Across one field was a cottage, the only house to be seen; a muddy lane led to it, and she hurried along it. It was a peculiar little house, with a door at the side, so placed that none of the windows commanded it. There was no bell, and Nerine knocked loudly. Her knock seemed to echo in an empty house. She knocked again, for there had been smoke coming from the chimney as she came up the lane; the people must be in the kitchen. To make some one hear, and let her in from the soaking rain, she rapped with the head of her umbrella on the door.

There was a rush of pattering feet behind it, and a volley of angry barks. There was a dog at home at least. She tried the door, but it was locked, and she gave it a little shake to make certain. The rain was slowly soaking her from head to foot.

"Who's there?" came a loud, querulous voice from behind the door. "Go away! Go away, or I'll shoot. I won't have any men prowling around here."

"I'm not a man, and I'm not prowling." Nerine was frightened, but she spoke out with coward's courage, which dare not run away. "I'm a girl, and I only want to come into your porch till the rain's over."

It was certainly a woman's voice inside the door, and she was not going to be afraid of a woman; unless, with a horrible quaking, she was crazy. And at the bare idea the girl turned sharply and stood ready to run for her life. But the woman might shoot her if she moved within reach of the windows. It was better to come to terms than to run.

"You need not let me in if you don't want to," she said calmly, though her knees shook under her. "I will go away, certainly, if you like."

"Go out where I can see you," said the voice, doubtfully.

The girl hesitated. Then she marched around the corner of the house and stood in full view of the window; she would have to pass it to run away, and she did not for a second take the threat of shooting her for an earnest one. Women who reside in cottages do not usually possess guns.

She walked back to the door, trembling. The place was so lonely, she wished a thousand times that she had never come to it. But it was too late to retreat—for the door flew open, and out rushed a bristling fox terrier, while behind him stood a red-faced, untidy woman.

"Down, Snap! down sir!" she cried angrily, eying Nerine from head to foot. "You can come in till the rain is over," she added, grudgingly.

Nerine stared at her. Certainly she had neither gun nor pistol, but she was not a prepossessing-looking hostess. She had a dim idea that she had seen her before.

"I don't want to come in unless you want me to. I am as wet as I can be now."

The woman stirred the fire and drew up a her sleeve.

"You're wringing wet," she said, her offensive manner quite gone. "I beg your pardon for keeping you standing, but I'm alone, and it's a lonely place. I thought you were"—she hesitated—"a tramp. Please to walk in and dry yourself," and she stepped back for the girl to enter.

Nerine looked at the pelting rain; she would rather have walked ten miles in it than enter this strange shelter, but it would be so cowardly to retreat.

With a quick heart, and the dog growling at her heels, she went into the house.

The passage was dark, and close, and cold; the woman led the way into an untidy sitting-room, where a small fire burned in a grate unblackened and rusty. The disorder of the room was beyond words, but it was well furnished, and even luxurious, underneath the litter of clothes, books and empty bottles which covered every table and chair.

The woman stirred the fire and drew up a chair to it.

"Sit down, won't you?" she said, almost timidly, "and excuse my not being dressed. I never expect visitors, and I have no girl, so the place is untidy."

"It is nice and warm." Nerine was shivering over the scanty fire. Not dressed, her hostess had said! She had on the wreck of a gorgeous tea-gown, and round her shoulders was a magnificent sable cape. Her hair was unbrushed and her face was streaked with black. The girl gave an anxious, covert glance at the empty bottles.

"You have a beautiful dog?" she observed sincerely, holding out her hand to let the terrier smell it. "He must be a great friend when you are alone here."

The dog licked her hand grudgingly. The woman snatched him in her arms with passionate affection.

"He's my only friend. Aren't you, Snap? Your mistress' only friend. Why, many a time, miss, when I'm alone here at night, I'd go wild with fright if it weren't for the dog."

In spite of the torn lace and the wonderful sable, it was easy to see the woman was not, and never had been a lady. But she was a sad and pitiful object in her dirty finery, and in the discomfort of the once luxurious room. Nerine felt a sudden pity for her.

"Yes," she assented, "it must be very lonely. I am staying at a farmhouse at Combe, with my little cousins, and when they are gone to bed I feel dreadfully lonely; and it must be far worse for you if you are always alone."

"I am—always. And I haven't a friend in the world but Snap, though I'm a married woman, too!"

"Then your husband doesn't live here?" with a kindly interest in the extraordinary female who sat opposite, her fet guiltless of stockings, stuffed into unlaced leather boots.

The woman laughed.

"Him—live here! He is in a grand house like a lord, and here is where he puts me." Her voice grew so excited that the girl's fear of her returned. The dog growled in sympathy as he sat on the woman's lap.

"I think I must go now. I am quite dry." Nerine arose nervously, for apprehension was beginning to get the better of her; her hostess was not drunk, in spite of the empty bottles, but the girl was not at all sure that she was not crazy. "You have been very good to let me come in."

"I would never have let you wait in this weather, miss, if I had seen you," said the woman, earnestly. "But I was afraid that it was—someone else," with the odd hesitation she had shown before. "I, suppose, miss, you would not take a cup of tea with me. I was just going to take one." She pointed to a tin saucepan perched unsteadily on the fire. "I had better things once, but that's all I have now. I dare say you couldn't fancy your tea out of it."

The saucepan did not really look inviting, but the woman meant kindly, and Nerine repressed a shudder.

"I would like a cup of tea," she answered with her sweet-eyed smile, "more than anything, if it would not be a trouble to you to get it ready."

"Would you, really? Oh, it's no trouble. You'll excuse the poorness of it, but I don't like to think I kept a lady out in the rain."

She rose and went to a cupboard in the corner of the room. At least, it was a cupboard now; it had once been a wonderful Indian cabinet, all carving and inlay. She took out a china teapot and some biscuits; and presently a paper of tea.

Nerine watched her make the tea. The water looked clean at least. The milk—horrid thought—would be the rub! Perhaps there wasn't any she fervently hoped not.

But the lady in the strange array of rose-pink satin and thick leather boots went over to the window, and, opening it, brought in a gust of wind and rain, and a little can of milk with a tight cover.

"The milk girl leaves it there, and she'd just gone when you came," she remarked. "I buy it for Snap, principally." She produced two cups from the cupboard. "Perhaps you would pour out the tea; I am not well today, and my hand shakes."

Nerine had marveled that she had ever got the water into the teapot.

She poured out a cup for herself and her hostess, with a hasty glance of scrutiny at the inside of the milk-can, for jug there was none. It was clean and fresh, and her cup was of thin and lovely china, if cracked, but never in her life had Miss Lispenard done a harder thing than to take the first sip of the unwelcome tea. Good manners and a kindly heart alone forced her to it.

To her wild surprise it was excellent tea, and the milk was fresh and creamy. The biscuits were musty, and she gave hers to Snap as soon as she dared.

"I am sure you never bought this tea in Combe," she remarked. "It is so very good."

"I got it in London last week. I can't touch poor tea." She drank thirstily. "I don't buy anything at Combe. I'd rather they'd think I was away and the house shut up. That grocer there talks about what I buy, so I never go near him now. I go to Walton for what I want."

"That's a long way." Nerine had finished her tea, and sat with her drying feet on the fender. "Do you come from there, miss?"

"No. I came from Belton Court, with my two little cousins. We are staying at Mrs. Palmer's till Miss Belton gets over the scarlatina."

"Will you be there long? Won't you take some more tea? Do, now."

"No more, thank you. No, I don't think I shall be there long. Why did you ask?"

"I was only going to ask you if you would come over here again, unless I frightened you too much with my silly talk about shooting."

"Oh, yes, I will come again."

"And you won't be turned against me by anything,"—the red face grew redder—"anything you may hear?"

"Not while I find you as I found you today," laughing, "and if you promise not to shoot me when I come to the door."

"Don't come to the door again. You come and knock at this window. But it's a long walk, and I'm asking too much of you."

"No, no, indeed. But are you sure you would like me to come?"

The faded, watery eyes looked at her intently.

"I never knew a real lady before," the woman said, simply, "and you've treated me as if I was a lady, too. You don't know what it is to live in this lonely place, and never get a kind word from any one, and be terrified at every knock because it might be some one who would like to get me out of the way."

"Tramps, do you mean?"

"No, not tramps. Him—my husband."

"But he wouldn't—no man would, surely——"

"You don't know him," interrupted the woman. "But I'll be a match for him, with all his fine manners." She moved feverishly to the window, as though she expected to see a dread sight. "I mustn't talk of him; it excites me. And I think you had better go now, before it begins to get dark. And you'll come again, promise me. You make me feel better." She made an unmeaning effort to pick up some of the untidy garments on the floor. "I'll have the place cleaned up by the time you come. I suppose it won't be tomorrow?"

Nerine shook her head.

"Today is Saturday. I'll come on Tuesday." She put her hand into the very dirty and shaky one held out to her, and patted the dog; then she went forth on her homeward way through what was now a gentle spring rain.

CHAPTER XX.

A PLEASANT LITTLE TEA PARTY.

The steady spring downpour soaked the garden and trickled down the window panes of Nerine's sitting-room. Sunday morning church had exhausted the goodness of the two children. An occasional whirlwind of flying feet and shrieks passed the sitting-room door, but otherwise there was no sign of their existence.

Miss Lispenard felt that perhaps their room was better than their company, but had an uneasy conscience about the way they were spending their Sunday afternoon.

"I suppose I ought to get a book and read to them," she thought, as she stretched one slim foot to her cheerful fire and then the other. "But it's so much nicer to read to myself. Dear me," restlessly, "I wish Agatha were here. I wonder how she is getting on."

She looked at the clock as she settled down to read comfortably. It was just four. At five tea would arrive, and May and Joan. Thank fortune that Tommy could no longer accompany them! At least, with compunction, remembering Joan's tears, he had to die some day, and it was just as well it was over. How odd that Mr. Fairfax, by the way, should live so near. How Lady Satterlee had chattered about him on the way home from the ball! He looked as though he might be nice. Certainly it was good of him to take so much trouble about Tommy.

A figure passed the window in the driving rain. Mrs. Palmer's Sunday visitors apparently possessed very serviceable mackintoshes and umbrellas, but Nerine was deep in her book and did not notice.

Suddenly the sitting-room door flew open and in burst Joan, dragging an apparently unwilling companion by the hand. May followed, bearing a pink box, which looked as though it might hold delightful things for a wet Sunday afternoon.

"You said I was to forgive him, because his murdering Tommy was a—naccident," Joan said, carefully. "So I asked him to come in and stay to tea."

Nerine was so straight and tall in her best frock of black crepon, and so undisguisedly surprised at his appearance, that Mr. Fairfax wondered if he had the courage to stay. He disengaged himself from Joan and shook hands.

"I came over to see that you were none the worse for the fright I gave you," he remarked, with the voice and accent that were so like Lady Satterlee's. "But I really didn't mean to inflict myself on you for the whole afternoon."

"We—I—shall be very glad," she replied, mechanically. She was not really glad at all, for she knew he would talk about the Satterlees.

Fairfax sat down on the other side of the fire. The room was so homely and comfortable, with its vases of fresh spring flowers and its litter of books and Nerine's knitting. It was a far pleasanter place than any of his big rooms at home.

"This is how Tommy will look when I bring him back to you," he said to Joan, taking a careful little pencil drawing out of his pocket. It was Tommy, exactly as he had been in life, sitting erect, with his tail out behind him.

"Is it for me? Can I have it?" Joan's eyes lighted up as they had not done since Tommy's decease.

Fairfax took her on his knee.

"Wouldn't you rather have sweets, like your sister's?" he inquired, gravely.

"No! no! I want my Tommy's picture."

"Here you are, then, and if you go and look in my coat in the passage, there is a blue box like May's pink one."

Joan bestowed her picture in the front of her pinafore, and then scuttled down and out into the hall, May after her.

Nerine laughed a little when they were gone.

"You are very good to them," she said. "Do you know I was meanly congratulating myself that Tommy had met his end just before you arrived. He was a most short-tempered beast, and I was dreadfully afraid of him."

"I used to own one very like him," Fairfax returned, "and to tell the truth, that was his portrait, and not Tommy's, which I presented to Joan."

"We never had any pets. Mr. Mayne would not let us," Nerine said, wistfully. "So I never told Joan that Tommy gave me cold shivers. I remembered my own feelings when Agatha and I wanted to keep guinea-pigs, and were told they were disgusting animals."

"Mr. Mayne is——" hesitatingly.

"My stepfather. My own father and my mother died when we were children. Lady Belton is the only real relative we have."

"Miss Belton was at Satterlee's dance with you, of course."

Nerine nodded. Was he going to ask her where Agatha was? She would take that subject in hand herself first. No one should say she was unwilling to talk about it.

"I was to have stayed with Lady Belton till my sister had finished her visit to Lady Satterlee, but Kit caught scarlatina, and I brought the children here to be out of the way. You know Agatha and Satterlee"—bringing it out with a true sister-in-law's indifference—"are engaged."

"Dora—Lady Satterlee wrote to me. She is my cousin, you know."

Nerine felt suddenly small. He had not been going to ask where Agatha was, after all.

"I wrote to Bobby, congratulating him. He is a very lucky young person, Bobby!"

Nerine colored.

"I think so, of course. But, then, Agatha is my twin sister, and I know exactly how nice she is."

Her voice shook a little, in spite of herself, and she turned her face away while she put out a hand to the bellrope. Fairfax was too quick for her.

"Let me," he said, and rang the one bell of the house with a really noble jingle. As he stood behind the girl he remembered her white face at Satterlee's dance, when Bobby had doubtless proposed to the other sister. What a plucky face this child put on it.

"Between ourselves," he said, confidentially, returning to his chair, "I never can find much joy in balls. I think they are very overrated amusements."

"I hate them!"

Fairfax did not laugh, which was kind in him.

"I shouldn't suppose you had been at many," he said.

"Not since I was a schoolgirl," she frankly answered, "and I loved them at first. But then—Oh, I got tired; and the men all said the same things."

Fairfax laughed now.

"I never suffered from that," he remarked. "I always find my partners say such extraordinarily different things that I am apt to retire from the fray much confused. But dancing in a ballroom is not half up to the same thing on skates. Did you ever waltz on the ice?"

"My beloved stepfather would not let me learn to skate. I have never been on skates, or been in a boat, or played tennis in my life."

Here was a rare bird, indeed.

"What!" he exclaimed. "Never engaged in those outdoor sports? I must congratulate you. Think of all the new experiences you have before you. But you don't long to play tennis especially, do you?"

Miss Lispenard laughed.

"I don't honestly. I never saw any girl who did not appear to more advantage looking on than playing."

"Exactly. It is a stupid game, as exhibited by the average young woman. Of course, I have seen a few women look well when they played."

"I would like to learn to ride," Nerine said, earnestly.

"Oh," as the door opened, "here is nurse! Nurse, Mr. Fairfax will stay to tea."

"I did not think you meant to ask me," the visitor remarked with much frankness when nurse had departed. "Even now I feel shy about staying."

"I could not turn you out in such rain," rather demurely. She was beginning to like him in spite of his associations. "Really, I will be very pleased if you stay. But schoolroom tea, under Joan's auspices, is apt to be anything but a peaceful meal."

"I have peaceful meals at home. All by myself in a big room where there are always dark corners. I must confess," smiling, "to a deep dislike for dark corners."

"I thought you were always away. Did not Lady Satterlee tell me you were a great traveler?"

"I am sure she did not. She might have told you I went in for that horrid globe-trotting. Oh, I thought so," he added, with boyish mirth, which lighted up his spare, sunburned face wonderfully.

"She did say that exactly," confessed Miss Lispenard. "Do you know, I don't think I ever saw anything so pretty as Lady Satterlee in my life? So wonderfully and really young."

Lady Satterlee's cousin was discreet. He said nothing about the quality of mysterious boxes

Start Your War-Time Economy by Daily Canning

By Violet Marsh

EVERY housekeeper, unless she has already done so, should begin saving all kinds of glass containers, for a serious shortage of jars and tin cans is threatened. Wide-necked bottles that cannot be made air-proof are useful for putting preserves and jellies in, while small-necked ones can be used for fruit juices, and strained tomato for soups and macaroni, and sealed with cork stoppers and wax. Also of importance is the saving of cork stoppers.

Very healthful and delicious is the early tart apple, particularly the red astrakhan, made into sauce and canned for winter use. The flavor is far superior to the winter fruit, and the early apple requires much less sugar. When making apple sauce, what an easy matter to cook enough extra for one or more cans. The increased labor is hardly noticeable if done this way. This also applies to strawberries. When buying or picking your own berries, procure a few extra quarts of the ripest which often goes to waste, and cook them while other food is in preparation.

Here the most ideal economy may be practised, because the ripest and finest early fruit is often lost unless daily used, and the result of putting off the canning so it may be done all at once often means that, by the time the convenient day arrives, the best fruit has "gone by," and only "seconds" are available, which require more sugar and are of inferior flavor.

Sterilization

The success of canning depends upon absolute sterilization. If the proper care is exercised there need be no failure except, in rare cases, when a spore has developed in the can. Only fresh rubber rings can be safely used, for if they have lost their elasticity and softness the sealing will not be perfect. Much fruit each year is lost by using old rubber rings. Also examine each jar to make sure it is in perfect condition.

To sterilize the jars put them on their sides in a pan nearly filled with cold water, and in another pan of cold water place the covers. Bring to a boil, and boil at least fifteen minutes. Also plunge all canning utensils into boiling water before using them. A long-handled spoon placed inside of jar is useful for removing them from the boiling water as fast as they are filled, for they can thus be drained and placed in position to fill without touching with the hands. Fill jars to overflowing, then scrape the rim of jar with sterilized knife blade and put on rubber ring which has been washed and dipped in a quart of boiling water to which one teaspoonful of cooking soda has been added. Work rapidly while filling and sealing jars.

Canning Recipes

CANNED EARLY APPLES.—Wash and stem the apples, and cut into small pieces, putting them immediately on to cook before the fruit discolors from exposure to the air. Use as little cold water as possible to start the cooking, as early apples are very juicy. If it is necessary to add more water, it should be boiling hot. Cook apples as quickly as possible, as slow stewing gives a dark, cloudy appearance. As soon as thoroughly cooked, put quickly through a wire sieve, and return to kettle with sugar to taste. Cook five minutes and seal in glass jars that have been prepared as above described. The apples may be pared and cored before cooking, but the sauce will have a much finer flavor if the whole fruit is used.

JELLY MAKING AN ASSURED SUCCESS.

CANNED STRAWBERRIES, No. 1.—As strawberries contain so much juice it is generally more successful to can by adding the sugar direct to berries. To every two quarts of washed and hulled berries add in layers one and one half cups of sugar. Bring slowly to a boil, in order to avoid necessity of adding water. Cook slowly until fruit is done, and seal at once. If cooked after fruit is tender it will turn dark. Do not have fruit more than four inches deep in kettle.

CANNED STRAWBERRIES, No. 2.—Fruit cooked in the oven is one of the most approved ways, as the color, shape and flavor is thus best retained. Prepare jars and fill them while hot with the fruit, then fill with syrup for which a recipe is next given. Run a silver-bladed knife around the jar, that any air bubbles may escape. Set jars in a pan of hot water and have the oven moderately hot. After the cooking point has been reached, bake between ten and twenty minutes. Remove from oven, take off the cover and place rubber band, and fill with syrup. Replace cover and set jars on a board out of the draft to cool.

SYRUP.—One pint of sugar and one pint of water stirred until sugar is dissolved over a moderate heat. Boil very slowly, without stirring, twenty to thirty minutes. Hard boiling or stirring is liable to cause the syrup to crystallize.

STRAWBERRY PRESERVE.—Use equal weights of sugar and strawberries, put into the preserving kettle in layers, until about four inches deep. Heat slowly to the boiling point, and then cook ten minutes, skimming occasionally. Pour the cooked fruit into platters to a depth of two to three inches. Place the platters in an unused room, in a window where the sun comes in most of the day. In three or four days' time the fruit will grow plump and firm and the syrup will be quite like jelly. Put cold, into jars or tumblers.

STRAWBERRY JUICE.—This is very useful for flavoring, and as a beverage when diluted with water. Bottles may be used, but they should be boiled fifteen minutes, and clean corks used. Wash and crush berries and put into preserving kettle. Heat slowly and gently cook one half hour. Over a colander put a square of cheese-cloth, and pour into it the cooked fruit. Drain well. Measure juice, and to each quart add one pint of sugar. Stir until dissolved, and simmer five minutes after it begins to cook. Fill hot bottles, leaving just room for the cork. Drive in cork, cutting off smooth with top of bottle. Have ready a small dipper of hot sealing wax, and while holding bottle firmly in both hands with a cloth, dip the corked end into hot wax.

Successful Jelly-Making Methods

In no branch of preserving does one feel less sure of success than in jelly making. While it is a very simple process, yet it requires judgment and a knowledge of materials used in order to make sure of satisfactory results.

The jellies made from juicy fruits, such as currants and grapes, require less skill than those to which water is added. The jelly-making substance in fruit is called pectin, and is at its best when the fruit is just ripe, or a little under ripe. If the fruit juice is in a fermenting condition, or if the juices are boiled too long, the pectin loses its power of gelatinizing, and the jelly will be "gummy." Hence, it is of the greatest importance that jelly should be made from fruit freshly picked; also that it should not be gathered after a rain, as it will have absorbed water which must be boiled out. Fruit grown in a hot, dry season will contain a greater per cent of sugar, and require one quarter less the amount of added sugar in making jelly, but in cold, wet seasons, an equal amount of sugar and fruit juice must be used. Dusty fruit should be quickly washed and drained to prevent its absorbing water. Fruits that require the addition of water for jelly is desired. For first quality of jelly, strain ing, and not stirred to break the fruit if clear jlly is desired. For first quality of jelly, strain through double thickness of cheese-cloth, then through flannel without pressing the bags. For second quality squeeze the bag until juice is extracted, and make into separate lot of jelly.

Covering Jellies

The large per cent of sugar contained in jelly protects it from the action of bacteria, but unless covered it will mould and evaporate. The following is quite the surest way of protecting jelly under all conditions: Cut circles from paper the size of top of glass. When the jelly is set and firm, brush the top with alcohol or brandy, which destroys any fermentation germs that may already have developed. Also dip the paper circle in the spirits and put it over the jelly. If there are tin covers, dip in boiling water, wipe dry and cover glasses; though better than covers, is a thin coat of paraffin poured on top of the paper.

The next best covering is a coat of paraffin a little less than one quarter of an inch thick. In the absence of the paper wet in spirits, set the jelly in windows where a day's hot sun will fall upon it, the sun being a mold spore destroyer, and the heat will insure the top of jelly being perfectly dry. Melt the paraffin after cutting it into pieces, putting it into a dish which is set in another dish containing hot water. It will soon be warm enough to pour over jelly.

Jelly Recipes

CURRANT JELLY.—Pick over, removing leaves and poor fruit; mash and drain thoroughly, but do not stem. Mash a little of the fruit in bottom of kettle to get sufficient juice to start cooking, then put all the fruit in. Very slowly bring to a boil and simmer ten minutes, or until the currants look white. Pour through a coarse colander, then into a jelly bag. Measure juice, and to every pint add one pound of granulated sugar. Bring juice to a boil and simmer ten minutes, then slowly add sugar, stirring constantly, and when it has simmered two minutes, move back and skim and pour into hot glasses.

GRAPE JELLY.—Acid grapes not over-ripe make the best jelly. Satisfactory jelly is also made from equal portions of ripe and green grapes; also from half ripe grapes. Mash grapes and follow recipe for making Currant Jelly.

CURRANT AND RASPBERRY JELLY.—Use equal parts of fruit, and follow directions for making Currant Jelly.

BARBERRY JELLY.—Cut crab apples in small pieces, using two quarts of berries to one quart of cut-up apple. Add just water enough to prevent the berries from sticking to kettle, and proceed the same as for Currant Jelly.

APPLE OR CRAB APPLE JELLY.—Wash and drain fruit; remove stems and cut the whole apple into small pieces. Nearly cover with cold water and cook until apples are tender. Let the juice drip through a jelly bag. Allow one pint of juice to one pound of granulated sugar. Heat sugar in oven in shallow baking pans, stirring occasionally. Boil juice fifteen minutes and slowly add hot sugar. Boil apple juice ten minutes longer than crab apple juice. Simmer five minutes, skim and fill hot glasses.

RASPBERRY, BLACKBERRY AND CURRANT IN EQUAL PARTS.—Make the same as Currant Jelly.

PLUM JELLY.—Use underripe acid plums. Wash the fruit and stem. To four quarts of fruit, add two cups of water, and slowly cook until the plums are boiled to pieces. Strain and proceed the same as with Currant Jelly.

QUINCE JELLY.—Rub the quinces smooth with a coarse towel, and cut out the blossom end. Pare, quarter and core the fruit. Have a large bowl of cold water at hand, and drop in the pieces of perfect quince, to later be used in preserve. In the preserving kettle, put the parings, cores and imperfect pieces of fruit, all very finely cut up. To every two quarts of fruit thus prepared, add three cups of water and cook gently for two hours. Strain and finish the same as apple jelly.

QUINCE AND CRAB APPLE.—Cook equal parts of fruit and proceed as with Apple Jelly.

The accompanying illustration shows an excellent arrangement for supporting a jelly bag during the draining process, but just as useful a substitute can be made from common bail wire. Make the support the same on both sides, as shown on one side of kettle in illustration, for by so doing, it will hold up the weight of several quarts of fruit. Make the upright wires long enough to clear bag from kettle. Make the inside circle in one piece with the uprights. Make the outside circle of wire that holds the bag about one half inch larger in diameter, so it will slightly hang over the inside circle. The bag is cut in a circle and the edge hemmed over the wire. The bag is washed without taking from the wire.

Jams

Canning and jam making should be carried on at the same time in order to obtain best results as to quality, appearance and economy. Pick over each lot of berries intended for canning; the soft-ripe and broken ones unsuitable for canning should be culled out to be made into jam, using only the perfect berries for canning; thus every berry can be utilized and the quality of the product improved. Add to the culls an equal quantity of slightly underripe berries, as they are necessary to give a jelly-like consistency to the jam. Weigh the berries and allow three quarters of a pound of sugar to each pound of fruit. Continuous and quite rapid cooking with constant care is essential.

In stirring jam, use a wooden spoon or paddle, moving it across the center of the vessel first one way and then the opposite, and next around the pan, gently moving the mixture from the bottom of the pan, being careful not to stir rapidly or beat. When the jam is finished, a little cooled in a spoon and dropped from the side, will not pour, but fall in a flake.

Strawberries, loganberries, currants, raspberries, grapes (wild or cultivated), green tomato with the addition of two ounces of preserved ginger to every four pounds of tomato, make some of the best jams.

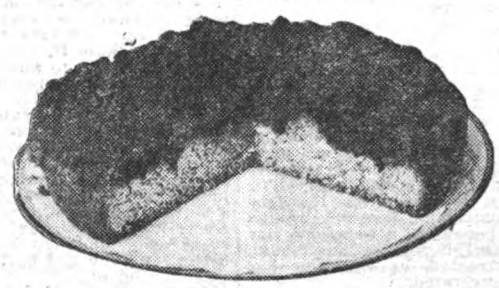
Jam is one of the most valued elements of the rations issued to the British and French soldiers in the trenches.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

Saves Eggs in Baking

You can use fewer eggs with Royal Baking Powder. A great advantage in these days of mounting food prices.

In most recipes the number of eggs may be reduced one-half or more and often left out altogether by using a small additional quantity of Royal Baking Powder, about a teaspoon, in place of each egg omitted.



Every mail brings to us letters from women who are enthusiastic over their success with this new method. One mother writes:

"Nothing like Royal Baking Powder. My little girl can eat biscuits and muffins made of it with no discomfort—while she cannot eat others."

Try the following recipes which are illustrations and see how well this plan works. You must use Royal Baking Powder, which is made from Cream of Tartar, derived from grapes, to get the best results—powders made from alum and other mineral substitutes often leave a bitter taste.

Coffee Cake

Very popular at the breakfast table and most appetizing when freshly made at home and served hot

2 cups flour
½ teaspoon salt
2 tablespoons sugar
No Eggs
4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
2 tablespoons shortening
½ cup milk

DIRECTIONS:—Mix and sift dry ingredients. Add melted shortening and enough milk to make very stiff batter. Spread one-half inch thick in greased pan, add top mixture and bake about one-half hour in moderate oven.

(The old method called for 2 eggs)

TOP MIXTURE

2 tablespoons flour
1 tablespoon cinnamon
4 tablespoons sugar
4 tablespoons shortening

DIRECTIONS:—Mix dry ingredients; rub in the shortening, and spread thickly over top of dough before baking.

Corn Bread

Everyone knows the great nutriment in corn.
Here it is in most appetizing form.

1½ cups milk
2 tablespoons shortening
1¾ cups corn meal
¼ cup flour
No Eggs
4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder
1 tablespoon sugar (if desired)
1 teaspoon salt

DIRECTIONS:—Sift the dry ingredients into bowl; add milk and melted shortening; beat well and pour into well greased pan or muffin tins and bake in hot oven about 25 minutes.

(The old method called for 2 eggs)

Equally satisfactory results in saving eggs may be obtained by using Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder, also made from Cream of Tartar, and now manufactured by this Company.

A new book containing many practical recipes, which economize in eggs and other expensive ingredients and produce food no less appetizing and delicious, mailed free on request. Address Royal Baking Powder Co., 130 William Street, New York.

Royal Baking Powder is a pure Cream of Tartar product derived from Grapes, a natural food, and adds none but healthful qualities to the food.

A Declaration of Dependence

"And that was the way
The deuce was to pay
As it always is, at the close of the day
That gave us—
Hurray! Hurray! Hurray!
(With some restrictions, the fault-finders say)
That which, please God, we will keep for aye
Our National Independence!"
Will Carlton:—How We Kept the Day.

THE "sane Fourth" idea had not yet reached Bison Gulch. Consequently, Miss Millicent Wright was awakened early in the morning by banging cannons and exploding powder. For a moment she was bewildered, then recalling that it was Independence Day, she arose, threw on a lacy morning wrap, tucked her hair into a coquettish little cap, and went to the window, from which she cautiously pushed the curtain.

Below in the street more than a half-dozen grown men with a bunch of young America was gathered. The men had erected a noise-making affair which consisted of a large flat rock upon which they placed loose powder; upon this they dropped another rock which caused the powder to explode with deafening racket.

"All in my honor, I know," murmured Millicent, and she boldly pushed aside the curtain now, and looked out.

A cheer went up from the men in the street as they beheld her, and she waved to them tantalizingly.

"I guess Bison Gulch is celebrating its share, don't you think, Miss Wright?" called out Larry Smith.

"Why, I thought it was solely in my honor," she plagued.

"Our putting up this here thing was," he replied, his freckles becoming more prominent because of the blush that a word from Millicent always brought to his cheeks.

"Say, we're going to have some ball game this afternoon, Miss Wright. Don't forget to come," admonished Blue Gulch Billy.

"I won't," and she waved a shapely hand coquettishly which included them all, then dropped the curtain and sat waiting for the summons to breakfast, enjoying all the while the cool mountain breeze which carried with it the tang of burnt powder.

Millicent sighed. This Fourth of July was her last day in Bison Gulch.

Her entree had been sensational. Clad in a white suit, the coat of which was lined with brilliant scarlet silk, with a hat of white on which reposed a splash of crimson flowers and held on her head with crimson velvet streamers tied under her left ear, she rolled into town in her automobile, driving herself!

She had made a vivid picture!

No one knew who she was, nor what she was there for.

Millicent, however, knew why she was there, and trembled in spite of her roguish smiles at the thought of what she had done, and she never would have done it had she not been one of those irresponsible creatures, authors! For finding herself running out of material, with a brain drained of ideas, she set forth to find some adventures, and at Bison Gulch she had gathered together enough material for a novel of book length. The people whom she met in the streets she idealized into heroes, villains, comedians, love-sick swains and the like, picturing herself as a beautious city maid in distress, in thrilling situations, doing good, driving men distracted, or whatever her mood and imagination suggested.

Then the bold idea of encouraging all the fellows who came to worship at her shrine seized her, and immediately she put it into operation.

She led them on, until, one by one, they proposed and were accepted. She placed an embargo on them, however. They must not let it be known that they were engaged. So it happened that she was now engaged to seven men in and about Bison Gulch. She had promised to marry them all on the night of the Fourth of July, the very night when she planned to quietly motor out of the little town and back to her home in the East.

If any of her plans went awry, she would find herself in a very hornet's nest of enraged men, but the game was worth the candle. She didn't know but what it would serve her right if she did get caught in her own net, and she laughed and shuddered at what the outcome could be. But her own feelings she was able to transfer to paper, and so she didn't care, for being an authoress, she delighted in new experiences. If she "got away with it," it would make interesting reading, but if she didn't—well, she'd have plenty of cold chills to analyze if she were caught.

She glanced down the street where flags were waving and boys shouting as they touched off their firecrackers. At various places along the street she saw her seven suitors. There was Larry Smith with his red hair and freckles, Brazilian John whom she nicknamed "Don Quixote" because his looks reminded her of that hero of Cervantes, but whom, she knew, was just the opposite of that gallant knight; Blue Gulch Billy who worked in a mine in Blue Gulch; S. I. G. Rance, so called from the initials of the company for which he worked; Belmont who was a foreman for the S. I. G. Co., Charlie Singer who worked in a local store, and Mac Kitterage who was superintendent of the Weaver Ranch.

Somehow Millicent felt a little ashamed of leading on Big Mac, for he was a man who took things seriously; the rest of the fellows would quickly forget her, but Mac wouldn't—at least, not right off. And surely when he discovered how false she was, it would hurt him rather than affect him as she felt it would the others. They would simply curse and swear at her and let it go at that, while Mac would undoubtedly carry the wound for sometime.

Her breath choked a little at the thought, especially when she recalled the evening he had walked at her side, and told her of his love, an outburst so different from the others; a simple manly declaration of love from the heart of an honest man, a man who had always been honorable, a man who always would be. She recalled to the minutest detail that night when those strong arms, clothed in the simple gray shirt came about her, and she could still feel the beat of his heart against hers as he pressed her to his bosom.

To him alone had she allowed this privilege; her other admirers had been obliged to be satisfied with a mere pressure of her hand, and the further privilege of being allowed to place an arm loosely about her waist, for she was so wonderfully spirituelle and "fluffed up" they dared not touch her much, lest they "muss" her up!

She felt herself guilty, however, in feigning a semblance of love for the big, dark-haired fellow—then with a laugh and toss of her head, she dismissed all thoughts of him. After all, one cannot have conscientious scruples if he is an author in search of material!

After breakfast, she dressed herself most becomingly, adding a touch of patriotism to her costume in the shape of a bunch of red, white and blue silk ribbon, and started on her way to a certain pretty little gully where she often sat and made her notes.

She was not destined to reach it today, for her lovers would not allow it. The first one she met was Larry who grinned, showed his teeth and with a foolish smile asked her whether she didn't wish that it was seven o'clock, since that was the time they were to "elope!" She admonished him to silence.

This was the first event of a strenuous morning during which she had to use a general's tactics in keeping her seven lovers from revealing their secret to each other, and it was with a sigh of relief that she returned to her boarding place at noon, and was rid of them for some time.

But they were on the job a few hours later and bore her in state at the head of the impromptu parade which made its way to the ball grounds where Bison Gulch was to scrap it out with Red River, a town some ten miles distant.

Of her admirers, five were on the ball team, and they played even as gloriously as the knights of old jousted for their lady's favor. Mac Kitterage did not play, neither did Larry, and often the last named spoke so familiarly that many times during the afternoon, Millicent felt inclined to slap the presuming little wretch's face.

She had not realized how difficult it was going to be to get away, but as the afternoon wore on, she felt that she must escape somehow. Finally it dawned upon her to faint in the midst af an exciting inning. She accordingly did so.

Mac and Larry, thereupon, had to take her home and after seeing her safely in the house, camped upon the front porch. Millicent, peering cautiously through the curtains, saw there was no danger from that quarter, so she picked up her little handbag, kissed her landlady good by, and quietly went through the rear door of the house, and fled across rear lots and yards until she came to the place where her automobile stood in readiness for her.

Just as she sat to the wheel, a wild roar was borne to her on the languid breeze from the ball ground where Bison Gulch had won!

At the sound, Millicent advanced the gas, pushed in the clutch, started the machine and soon was racing down the alkaline trail as fast as the machine could fly.

She made nice progress for some miles, but as is sometimes the case, a perfectly decent automobile may get up on its ear, and this is just what Millicent Wright's did. With a gentle purr, the engine died down. Millicent thought she had simply "killed" it, so she was not troubled, and worked her electric self-starter. But nothing doing! She tried it again and again until the battery gave out, then getting out, she tried her handy little crank. But though she tugged and "threw it over," the engine remained dead.

"My word, what shall I do?" she thought, with mixed amusement and fright. She had a nice distance to cover to get to Durange, the town for which she was headed, for of course she couldn't go back to Bison Gulch. What was the matter with the machine, anyway?

Had she known it she could have probably fixed it. The wires had unfastened from the electric coil, a simple twist would have done the work. She didn't know, however, and consequently she was stalled.

A womanly impulse to sit down and cry came upon her, for she was in a plight indeed. Back in Bison Gulch were seven suitors awaiting her, forward she could not go unless she chose to leave the automobile out on the prairie. She wouldn't mind that very much, for the car was a roadster and not very costly, a thousand dollars would duplicate it, and a thousand dollars was not a great sum to an authoress who commanded royalties that were the envy of many near-famous writer folk.

Only the dusky, sunny prairie and alkaline dust blowing about greeted her in every direction, and how could she ever walk to Durange?

Apparently, that, however, was the only course left to her. Fortunately she had taken a bit of lunch, and a box of bonbons, and then there was a bottle of water in a scientific can which kept it cold. Well, this was her punishment, so the sooner she made up her mind to walk on, the better, and she had best do it at once since dusk was coming on.

With an amused laugh, she began to gather together what she would need. While so engaged, she happened to look up and saw a cloud of dust tearing along the prairie from the direction of Bison Gulch. For a moment her heart leaped up with relief, then she turned cold with terror. What if it were one of the seven? But it couldn't be for if one found out, all would, and there would be a comparing of notes, and the whole mob would swoop down upon her! No, it must be a stranger.

She would have run and hidden herself so that she might reconnoiter, but her automobile was the only thing to be seen on the flat prairie if we except the line of low hills in which Bison Gulch was hidden.

There was nothing left to do but await the on-coming horseman, who grew larger and larger as he came loping along, until he materialized into the figure of Mac Kitterage. He came up with a great flourish and stopped so suddenly that the broncho reared up. His face was grim.

"What's the matter?" was his greeting.

"Why, Mr. Kitterage," she smiled up at him, "I was out for a little ride and my machine balked——"

"And left you in a rather peculiar position, didn't it?"

"I was so frightened, I thought I might have to stay here all night and listen to the howling coyotes. Oh, suppose you hadn't come?"

"Then you're glad to see me?"

"How queerly you talk," she answered, her mein cool and calm.

"Well, I'll be—am I crazy, or are you?"

"What are you talking about?"

"Say, didn't I leave you at Mrs. Green's boarding house, sick with a headache?"

"I? Oh, Mr. Kitterage, won't you please see if you can find out what the trouble with the car is?"

"Didn't you faint in the ball park today?" he continued, ignoring her request.

"I was writing letters all the afternoon! Mr. Kitterage, how queerly you talk! Please, won't you look at the car?" for Millicent was in hopes that he might fix it, whereupon she planned to hop into it and give him the slip. She knew she could outdistance him in a couple of minutes provided he didn't shoot after her and puncture her tires.

"Now, listen here, my lady," he began quietly, bu with chilling tone, "I came out to help you if I could, but if you're going to make a fool of me, I'll quit. Larry told me that you had promised to marry him tonight! You made the same promise to me, too! And to Brazil, Billy, Charlie, S. I. G. and Belmont. At first they were going to beat each other up; then they began to compare notes. Mrs. Green told them you had gone for a little auto ride but that you would return. I guessed you had simply cleared out, but I wanted to be sure you were well on your way, because the boys are determined to come after you. Good night! There's the pack of them now," and he waved his hand toward another cloud of dust raised by the hoofs of six welted bronchoes.

"The boys compared their licenses," he went on, "and all were made out in different names which you led them to believe was your right one, and that 'Miss Wright' was simply an assumed name. I didn't understand Rev. Jones's smile when I asked him to perform the ceremony for us tonight and his statement that he'd be busy, as he had others to perform. I do now. Larry got a Catholic priest, Brazil held back the minister from Red River, and S. I. G. and Belmont each got a justice of the peace. Now, what does it mean? You haven't told me a word, and the boys will be here in a couple of minutes."

It was too good, and Millicent Wright, little realizing that she was dealing with men of flesh and blood and not the creations of her brain was highly elated with the maelstrom into which she had plunged, banking on her sex and personality to carry her through.

"I don't know what you're talking about," she said decidedly, her courage and spunk rising.

Mac sprang from his horse, and caught her wrist.

"Listen, young lady! It may seem a joke to you, but when you find yourself confronted with a half-dozen angry, passionate men, it will not be funny. I came on ahead, thinking I might be of some help to you, but since you disclaim all knowledge of your pranks, you may take the consequences!"

He glared fiercely upon her, for just then the six came up in towering tempers, their horses flecked with foam.

"Got here afore us, didn't ye?" blurted out S. I. G. Rance, "well, ye got the gal, now what are we going to do to her?"

The six dismounted, the horses trailed off to the byway to crop the prairie vegetation and the men made a circle about the undaunted authoress.

"Gentlemen," she queried, looking from one face to another, "gentlemen, what does this mean? You, once all my friends, looking so fiercely upon me. I thought you missed me, had feared for my safety and had come to look for me, lo, you come, but I find nothing but upbraiding and black looks. What does it mean?"

"We thought ye disappeared, eh?" grunted Brazilian John, otherwise Don Quixote, "well, we did, and I guess ye didn't mean that we should find ye. Well, we have, and we're going to get actions on ye, ye she Morman!"

(Millicent didn't know what a "she Mormon" might be, but guessed it meant, in John's understanding, a woman who wanted plural husbands!)

"Don't let her soft-soap us, men!" exclaimed Belmont. "She thought she could play her coquette's airs on us, and trap us into proposing to her and make fools of us. Now, let us fix her little wagon!"

"Mr. Kitterage, what does this all mean? Have you gentlemen all taken leave of your senses? All berating me, and talking in such foolish measures?" she asked, though her heart was sinking. "Suppose, I can't 'put it over them'?" she thought to herself. But if she couldn't, she'd use her feminine weapon. She'd cry!

"I think," she went on with trembling lip. "I think you seven big husky men would be ashamed to trap a poor defenseless girl in this fashion, and insult her and—and——" and bending her head, she went into a flood of tears not unmixed with hysteria. During the torrent, she was aware of a cubist-art impression of voices shouting questions until they became a conglomeration to which she entered a general denial. They asked her if she hadn't promised to marry them, if she hadn't given them all different names which she claimed was her right one, if she hadn't instructed them to secrecy regarding their engagments, if she hadn't suggested preachers, justices of the peace, and others to perform the ceremonies, and so on.

Dimly through it all, she could see that she had them confused, and that she had produced the effect she wished—to make them think she was utterly irresponsible.

"Poor kid, she's crazy as a loon," said Blue Gulch Billy, "better take her back to town, boys, and forget everything. It's clear she ain't responsible."

"You're a gentleman, Billy," she burst out, and it was exactly the wrong thing to do.

"Listen, boys," spoke up Charlie Singer, "that girl is as responsible as you or I. Whatever her right name is, I don't know, but while you boys were tearing around, I happened to pick up this book," and he drew a small volume from his pocket, "and it was written by Millicent Wright. The picture of the authoress is in the front of it, and if it isn't our Millicent Wright's picture, then I'm not Charles Singer. Boys, she's a writer of stories, and I wouldn't be a bit surprised if she didn't do this for the sake of a new book!"

"You villain," she cried, "you villain!"

"Because I guessed right?" he queried impudently.

Millicent didn't know how to extricate herself. Had it been a story, she would have done it easily, and cleverly, for she could have gulled her characters. But now—well, the only thing was to throw herself upon their mercy.

"You have guessed right," she said coldly, "and I shall take the consequences of my acts. I am an authoress, I did what I did for the sake of a story; add the sequel if you will."

"A nice sequel it will be if I have my way about it," snarled Belmont. "Shall I suggest what we make her do?"

They assented, for they little knew what to do with their fair captive now that they had her in their clutches.

"Well, what'll we do?" queried Larry.

"I'll tell you," said Belmont. "She promised to marry all of us—a thing which she can't do. But we'll make her marry one of us! We'll put the marriage licenses into a hat and let her draw one. Whichever one she draws, that's the fellow she'll tie up to!"
